God has promised to "stain the pride of all flesh;" and what can more effectually accomplish this than to expose its filthiness and hypocrisy to that light which it stands most in fear of? This process, so simple that a child is able to comprehend it, is found by experience to affect the chief adversary of the soul as the stone from David's sling affected the proud champion of the enemies of Israel—it lays him low. Therefore, those who have experienced the effect of genuine confession to God in His witnesses, need none of this reasoning.

Some, who admit the propriety of confessing sin, object to the presence of living witnesses—confessing to man as they term it. Let such candidly examine their hearts and see if the principal objection does not lie in the cross. If so, the benefit will be in proportion, as it will constitute an equal barrier against subsequent transgression. Moreover, this is strong evidence that the requirement is not of human, but of Divine origin.

Let us look a little further into this matter. It appears evident that principles have no power to manifest only as they are embodied in organization. At least, such is their presentation to us. Organization requires superiority of parts, that there may be harmony and concert in action. For without superiority there can be no dependence, and without dependence no government or controlling center of unity and interest. Again, distinct orders of principles require distinct forms of organization for their complete and distinct manifestation. Thus mineral and vegetable organizations are not adapted to principles of intelligent action. In the animal creation inferior to man, none are adapted to manifest reasoning intelligence, and much less religious sentiment and moral responsibility.

But man, as representative of the Creator, combines all previous manifestations, and more also. Though many inferior objects of Creation surpass man in the exhibition of particular qualities—as certain animals in strength and fleetness—and the operations of the elements in magnitude and power of effect, yet man is found superior in that he possesses an intelligence which is able to comprehend all and even compel them to servitude—while no other visible object, nor all of them together, can comprehend man nor enslave him. Hence we find in man the highest visible manifestation of Intelligent Deity.

Yet man, enslaved by his sensual nature, hating the light which would expose and reprove his sin, and fearing the loss of its pleasures, is far more likely to form of his fallen affections an "Image (or imagination) of the beast," before which to offer up his adorations, than he is to discern the Image and likeness of the God. "For where the true treasure is, there will the heart be also," and "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

It is, therefore, in vain for man to look for God as a Dispenser of forgiveness and salvation from sin, except in His duly accredited messengers or purified Saints, before whom as the Judgment seat of Christ, the covering must be taken off and all things made manifest. The Faithful and True Witness has declared "There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, neither hid that shall not be known." The covering referred to is hypocrisy, of which he had just cautioned his disciples to beware.

"And there is nothing secret which shall not be made manifest." "That which makes manifest is light. He that doeth righteousness cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God. He that dwelleth in God, dwelleth in light, and all his works are open, going beforehand to Judgment. For God is Light, and in Him is no darkness at all." Know ye not that the Saints shall judge the world? "And ye shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of [spiritual] Israel."

It alters not the purpose nor the wisdom of God that the sacred mediatorial office has been usurped by the false Prophet that succeeded the fall of the Primitive Church, and abused by false Christs, who profess to teach in Christ's name but deny him in works. Both characters were foretold and described by the true Witness, and the prediction has been amply verified through many centuries to the present day. But the fact of a counterfeit affirms the existence of the genuine original—and the latter cannot be debased nor its virtue and efficiency diminished by a spurious imitation, however well executed. And however highly esteemed the spurious may be, in the absence of the genuine, it should not deceive those who possess the genuine. It must fall into disrepute and neglect, wherever the genuine prevails.

THE WORLD.

—O—

"BE of good cheer, for I have overcome the world," was a saying of Jesus, to his disciples.

John says, "The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life are of the world."

All Christians may overcome the world, in the same way, and by the same spirit, in and by which Jesus overcame it—by the Christ Spirit.

"Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world, for I have chosen you out of the world; therefore, the world—they that are of the world—hateth you."

The hereditary passions and propensities of human beings, are evil treasures which all inherit from ancestry. To overcome them, is to lay up treasures in Heaven, where moth cannot corrupt, nor thieves steal.

Generation, and Regeneration, are two distinct principles, which cannot be permanently mixed. One or the other will prevail. No man can serve both, and serve God, to his acceptance. The married man and woman care for the things of this world—how he and she may please wife and husband.

The unmarried, for conscience sake, care for the Lord, to be holy, in body, as well as in spirit. Such live a pure, holy life, for the kingdom of heaven's sake.

Let all nominal Christians, who are blending flesh and spirit, examine themselves, and see whether they be in the faith, or no. If the Spirit of Christ be in them, they are not reprobate to the lives of the Apostles, nor to that of Jesus, their Lord and master. And how far will they then be from being Shakers?

ALMOST A CHRISTIAN.

—o—

DEAR ELDER FREDERICK:

How sad it is that the pleasures of this world and its fashions should have such a blinding influence, and hold in worse than Adamantian Chains so many souls who otherwise might become bright and shining ornaments, if not substantial pillars in the Zion of God on earth. Below is the substance of a note left with us by an inquirer, showing how near a person may come to a realization of his duty and yet fail to make the requisite sacrifice to obtain the pearl of great price—the enduring treasure.

"As this is the most important step that can be taken in life, I feel that it ought not to be taken without deep consideration.

"Earnestly desiring to find truth, yet I have no desire to hastily arrive at conclusions which I may afterward regret, I feel that my knowledge of Shakerism is not large enough to govern me in taking a step which should, when once taken, be life-long in its duration.

"I freely admit that the faith of the Shakers has impressed me favorably, and it appears to me to be the only true and just way of solving the great problems that agitate the public mind. All my impressions have been favorable, yet I am undecided. The importance of the step makes me hesitate before I take it. I have no wish to put my hand to the plow and then draw back.

"When I look at the importance of the step which involves the giving up of the ambitions and dreams of youth, a separation from the busy world, its many attractions, and a long farewell to friends, I feel more than ever the need of divine assistance to guide me to a right decision.

"To substitute, for worldly hopes and ambitions, the quiet and retired life of a Shaker, and to live a life founded upon the highest and most divine part of man's nature, is indeed a noble aim. To carry into every-day life principles so high and lofty as to discard self, must require a strong measure of faith in those who do it. I wish my faith and zeal were equal to it."

We trust that young man may not have to grope his way through the wilderness of sin, and in twenty or more years find he has been chasing an empty bubble, and regret that he had not had moral courage to break away from the world while he had health, strength and ability to battle for the truth and right.

With Love unfeigned we greet you. Unbounded thanks for the pleasurable interview and kind entertainment received during our recent visit to your abode.

May the blessing of Heaven be with you all. And may the sad afflictions which have befallen your society be overruled to our ultimate good—as a people—in an increase of wisdom, charity and unflinching devotion to the pure Gospel of Jesus and Ann,

Is the Prayer of your Brother,

John Whitely, Ayer, Mass.

THE SABBATH OF SABBATHS.

—o—

THE student of Jewish history finds much of interest to attach him to the fact that a power above the selfishness of man was in constant exercise, working for the resurrection of that peculiar people of the Judean period. I say constantly working; for although set times were indicated when the results of this unselfish power should be especially manifested, yet, ere the next anniversary for the manifestation of the same humanitarian spirit arrived, the influence of its predecessor had not become extinct. And although there has been a scattering of the Israelites, and the hands of many nations have been turned against the Jews, yet we find that the influence of their Sabbaths has apparently become an innate principle, so that a Jew has, if able, ever been ready to help a brother Jew.

We have, among professedly Christian people, a day intended to correspond with the seventh or Sabbath—the Lord's day. We wonder, realizing how nearly universal is the practice to abstain from physical employment on that day, that the mental powers do not present to the people why this should be called the Lord's day; and whether the constant recurrence of the Sabbath is a reminder of the fact that we should so live on that day as the Lord would have us live every day.

Is our Christian Sabbath any thing more, generally speaking, than a cessation from physical employment? Does it compare with the beautiful unselfishness that illustrated the ancient Jewish Sabbaths? Let us see. "Six days thou shalt labor and do all thy work, the seventh thou shalt rest," etc.; and the etcetera was loving thy neighbor as thyself, the rich feeding and administering to the wants of the poor—a reminder of the time when there should be no rich nor poor. Six months were had for me and mine, but the seventh was a holy convocation, during which the higher law of love was in such exercise that the estimation of neighbor above self was in excess till the month ended. Again, six years were allotted to the development of self; during which debtor, creditor, master and slave were, with the above exceptions, the rule. But the seventh was the Sabbatical year, when all debts were canceled and all slaves were free; the land was permitted to rest, and the free spontaneous growth thereof belonged to who should gather it. After seven times seven years came the fiftieth—the Sabbath of Sabbaths. Now were all debts forgiven, all slaves were made free, and the land, the source of all wealth, with property of every description—all reverted back to the people at large, and selfishness became severely shocked. In these Christian days do we not need some of these Sabbatical occasions, at least, to fulfill the beautiful law of loving our neighbors equally with ourselves? And would not we be nearer the millennial times if the Sabbath of Sabbaths had, for several centuries, been in active illustration upon every fiftieth year? We are aware that there would be much weeping, some wailing and gnashing of teeth, at the prospect and during the exercise of the power of this Sabbath; and we doubt not the Jews of old suffered all the pangs of crucifixion to self during this year of godly reproof; but are we, after the better law of Jesus has been preached for centuries, not as able to meet it and to submit to its excellent and universal blessings? Or are we content with taking a step backward, and glad to console ourselves with the idea that such procedures are now impracticable? Heaven forbid that there was any good thing practiced by the peculiar people of God in ancient times, that Christians can discard with impunity, until we can substitute something in its stead. What have we substituted for the Sabbath of Sabbaths?

NATURAL RIGHTS vs. GOVERNMENTAL USURPATION.

—o—

In a letter to James Madison, dated Paris, September 6, 1789, Thomas Jefferson says: "The question, whether one generation of men has a right to bind another, seems never to have been started either on this or our side of the water. Yet it is a question of such consequence as not only to merit decision, but a place also among the fundamental principles of every government. The course of reflection in which we are immersed here, on the elementary principles of society, has presented this question to my mind; and that no such obligation can be transmitted, I think, very capable of proof. I set out on this ground, which I suppose to be self-evident, that the earth belongs in usufruct to the living; that the dead have neither powers nor rights over it. The portion occupied by any individual ceases to be his when he himself ceases to be, it reverts to society. If society has formed no rules for the appropriation of its lands in severalty, it will be taken by the first occupant, and these will generally be the wife and children of the decedent. If they have formed rules of appropriation, those rules may give it to the wife and children, or to some one of them, or to the legatee of the deceased. So they may give it to his creditor. But the child, the legatee or creditor takes it not by natural right, but by a law of the society of which he is a member, and to which he is subject. Thus, no man can, by natural right, oblige the lands he occupied, or the persons who succeed him in that occupation, to the payment of debts contracted by him. For if he could, he might, during his own life, eat up the usufruct of the lands for several generations to come; and then the lands would belong to the dead, and not to the living, which is the reverse of our principle.

"Suppose Louis the XIV, and Louis the XV had contracted debts in the name of the French nation to the amount of ten thousand millions, and that the whole had been contracted in Holland. The interest on this sum would be five hundred millions, which is the whole rent-roll or net proceeds of the territory of France. Must the present generation retire from the territory in which nature produces them and cede it to the Dutch creditors? No; they have the same right over the soil on which they were produced as the preceding generations had. They derive their rights not from them, but from nature. They, then, and their soil are, by nature, clear of the debts of their predecessors. To present this in another point of view: suppose Louis XV and his cotemporary generation had said to the money lenders of Holland, 'Give us money that we may eat, drink and be merry in our day; and on condition that you will demand no interest until the end of thirty years, you shall then forever after receive an annual interest of fifteen per cent.' The money is lent on these conditions, is divided among the people, eaten, drunk and squandered. Would the present generation be obliged to apply the produce of the earth and of their labor to replace their dissipation? Not at all. * * *

"On similar ground it may be proved that no society can make a perpetual constitution, or even a perpetual law. The earth belongs always to the living generation; they may manage it, then, and what proceeds from it, as they please during their usufruct. They are masters, too, of their own persons, and consequently may govern them as they please. But persons and property make the sum of the objects of government."

In a letter to Dr. Gem, Jefferson says: "Buffon gives us a table of twenty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-four deaths, stating the ages at which they happened. To draw from these the result I have occasion for, I suppose a society in which twenty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-four persons are born every year, and live to the age stated in Buffon's table. Then the following inferences may be drawn: Such society will consist, constantly, of six hundred and seventeen thousand seven hundred and three persons, of all ages. Of those living at any one instant of time, one-half will be dead in twenty-four years and eight months. In such a society, ten thousand six hundred and seventy-five will arrive every year at the age of twenty-one years complete. It will constantly have three hundred and forty-eight thousand four hundred and seventeen persons, of all ages above twenty-one years; and the half of those of twenty-one years and upward living at any one instant of time will be dead in eighteen years and eight months, or say nineteen years. Then the contracts, constitutions and laws of every such society become void in nineteen years from their date." In a letter to John W. Epes, dated June 24, 1813, Jefferson says: "The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and power of man expire with his life by nature's law." In a letter to Major John Cartwright, dated June 5, 1824, Jefferson says: "Can one generation bind another, and all others in succession forever? I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the benefit of the living, not the dead. Rights and powers can only belong to persons, not to things. * * * A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, hold all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves. Nothing, then, is unchangeable but the inherent and inalienable rights of man." Equity.

HUDSON DONATION.

By unanimous vote, the citizens of Hudson have presented a beautiful hand fire engine to the New Lebanon Society of Shakers.

Accepting this timely and appropriate present, the brethren and sisters return heartfelt thanks to their friends in Hudson. To the Mt. Lebanon fraternity it will be a standing memento of friendship.

WAR is in utter violation of Christianity. If war be right, then Christianity is wrong—false—a lie. But if Christianity is true, if reason, conscience, religion, the highest faculties of man are to be trusted, then war is the error, the falsehood, the lie.

FAITH WITHOUT WORKS IS DEAD. WHY IS IT SO?

—O—

BECAUSE they are inseparably connected in principle. All theories, whether scientific or religious, are the seed of their Father, principle, but without the conception of Faith, in works, to bear, travail and bring forth, they are an abortion. Works, therefore, are the tangible form of the Eternal Mother, as theory is of the Father. Nurturing and fostering come in place. Work is indispensable, therefore, for the life and growth of all things. The Father is not without the Mother, nor the Mother without the Father, in the Lord, for regeneration, any less than in generation. The mere "Declaration of Independence" does not make us free. The striving by works is indispensable, to possessing liberty. Jesus worked and died, on the same principle that a mechanic works for his trade, and the apprentice, must follow the example of his preceptor. So the followers of Christ have the injunction of warfare in self-denial—with the "way that semeth right unto a man" and "the sin that doth so easily beset us."

The objection "If all were to become Shakers what would become of the world?" is a very shallow one. It comprehends neither Christ nor his mission, "If we do the will we shall know of the doctrine." Christ, thro' the medium, Jesus, fulfilled the law and all righteousness, independent of marriage, his mission was of a higher order, to introduce the resurrection. He did not condemn marriage, neither do the Shakers. But both have declared that marriage is a sphere that is natural, honorable under the law, but below the sphere of Christ and his resurrection.

Resurrection is not only a rising and changing, but a moving and travel, and like the Children of Israel, the present subjects of the Resurrection are now on their camping ground. The trumpet sound is beginning to be heard, for a further remove, "to be led—in a way we know not," and expected not—from the physical and moral sickness, disease, misery and crime of Egyptian darkness, toward the land of milk and honey, where the wilderness doth blossom as the rose, with homogeneous vine and fig tree to rest under. Not only so, a language, moral and orthographical, "pure," simple, natural, easy, uncontradicting, and perfectly reliable. And we are strongly impressed that the nearer we approach that desirable land of true liberty, the less we will feel disposed to draft the poor brute and fowl into bondage and service, because the strength of the lust of the flesh in concupiscence, and that of the eye, will be reduced, and the plausible but nefarious lust of the appetite also.

When the feminine temperance movement is prosecuted, we believe the "man-child," who is to "rule the nations," will begin to be made manifest. He will no doubt bear the appellation: "The Lord our Righteousness"—prominent features of temperance, truth and soberness. The injunction to be "temperate in all things" is of the Father, and will be carried out by the agency of the mother principle, thro' the medium of works, where the mother can be seen and is tangible, and where the voice of the Father in theory or word is audible. Deity is Dual, and from the increasing light, the faith is spreading, to become universal.

J. Barnett, Pleasant Hill, Ky.

EARTH COOLING.

—O—

A NEW theory is gaining ground, that the earth is to be destroyed by frost, and not by fire; and that the premonitory symptoms of decline are now upon us, in the form of severe winters.

There is abundance of evidence to prove that the arctic regions once enjoyed a temperate, if not a tropical climate. The forests in Greenland, which were once in a growing and thriving state, have been destroyed by the decreasing temperature.

Two Frenchmen recently explored the island of Spitzbergen; and a singular fact, noticed by them in connection with this island, is the enormous quantity of floating timber which literally covers the waters of the creeks and bays. How came this timber there, unless it grew in that region? and, if it grew there, these northern regions must once have had a milder climate.

Animals requiring a warm climate, also once flourished in high latitudes. A vessel lately from Alaska, brought to San Francisco a cargo of fossil ivory. The adjacent marshes are full of bones and tusks of ancient elephants, many sticking out of the mud like stumps. A member of an Alaska Fur company affirms that there is ivory enough on the Yucan river to supply the world for a hundred years. Whether this ivory region extends across the North American continent, or is confined to the country between the Pacific and the mountain range, is not yet determined.

A volume might be written, to show that the arctic regions once had a warm climate; but perhaps the above is sufficient.

I will now inquire what is the cause of this change in the climate? Professor Agassiz says the glaciers are moving from the hemispheres toward the equator. Will they finally meet, and thus entirely freeze us up.

Among the many theories which have been broached, to account for this phenomenon, there is none which appears more reasonable than that which ascribes it to the decreasing power of the rays of the sun. If the sun should give out, say twenty-five per cent more heat than it now does, the effect would be to increase the circulation of the atmosphere, when the heated air within the tropics would rise upward, and flow toward the poles; while the air in high latitudes would rush toward the equator. This would tend to equalize the temperature all over the globe. On the other hand, if Sol should lose two or three degrees of heat, a less circulation of air would be effected; and, although the tropical world would be nearly as warm, the arctic climate would approach nearer the equator.

The region where we live has been called a temperate climate; but it is becoming almost an arctic one. It is in the nature of things, to have one or two cold winters, and then one or two mild ones. In comparing our winters with those of former times, we must compare cold winters with cold ones, and mild winters with mild ones. As the great luminary, the sun, is of such vast dimensions, it will perhaps be two or three hundred thousand years before its light and heat will go entirely out.

J. B. Poole, Hancock, Mass.

In philosophizing upon the increasing frigidity of our latitude, would it not be well to take cognizance of the decrease of the earth's internal heat—not lay too much to Sol?

RESPIRATION AND VENTILATION.

—O—

WE need to breathe more pure air, that the venous blood may be properly changed. The purity of the air is affected by every respiration. The quantity of oxygen is diminished, the amount of carbonic acid increased, and a certain amount of watery vapor is expelled from the lungs in the expired air. If we breathe air it does not part with its remaining oxygen as freely as when it contained the proper amount of this element, consequently the same changes will not be effected in the lungs. We are familiar with the fact that a taper will not burn where carbonic acid exists in any considerable quantity. Hence the judicious practice of sinking a lighted candle into a well, before descending into it. A man may enter a subterranean passage and feel no inconvenience in breathing, while the dog that follows him falls apparently dead and soon dies, if not speedily removed to pure air. This arises from the fact that the carbonic acid sinks to the bottom of the cave. Birman says the air we breathe should not contain more than three and one-half per cent of carbonic acid. And as air once respired contains eight and a half per cent of carbonic acid, it clearly shows that it is not fitted to be breathed again. Physiologists tell us that from seven to ten cubic feet of air are necessary for a man to breathe each minute. Conditions varying the amount, such as size, age, and habit. The effects of breathing the same air again and again are well illustrated by an incident that occurred in one of our halls of learning. A large audience had assembled to hear a lecture; soon the lamps burned so dimly that the speaker and audience were nearly enveloped in darkness. The oppression, dizziness, and faintness, experienced by many of the audience, induced them to leave, and in a few minutes after the lamps were observed to rekindle, owing to the exchange of pure air on opening the door. We are familiar with the fate of the Englishmen who were imprisoned in the Black-Hole of Calcutta. A school-room, fifteen feet square and eight feet high, contains about 3,600 cubic feet of air. This room will seat thirty pupils, and allowing ten cubic feet of air to each pupil, per minute, all the air in the room will be vitiated in twelve minutes. We exclude the pure air from our sick rooms for fear the patient may take cold, forgetting it is one of Nature's best restorers. We should give more attention, in building, to ventilation, even at the expense of the architectural beauty. We open sewers for matters that offend the sight, or the smell, and contaminate the air. Our food and drink must be free from impurities. We even avoid drinking from a cup that may have been pressed to the lips of a friend. On the other hand, we assemble in crowds and draw into our mouths air loaded with effluvia from the lungs, skin, and clothing, of every individual present—exhalations offensive, to a certain extent, from the most healthy. But, when arising from a living mass of skin and lungs, in all stages of evaporation and disease, prevented by the walls and ceiling from escaping, they are, when thus concentrated, in the highest degree injurious and loathsome.

William Conway, West Pittsfield.

OUR JUSTIFICATION.

—O—

As individuals, what is our standing before God? Our walks in life, as moral beings, may be circumspect before men. We may, from our youth up, have kept the letter of the law, and yet in our hearts have many concealments which the light of our own consciences condemn, and in the sight of God are not justifiable. We may be morally honest, having been truthful in our language and just in our dealing, yet fail of coming to the standard of a christian, because of omissions and commissions—hidden sins—which the light of God would condemn, and which hold us in bondage until confessed before a man of God—our witness.

"Confess your faults, one to another." James, 5: 16. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." 1st John, 1: 9.

With all the ostensible fairness of honesty and justice before men—with all our conscientiousness and correctness in living to the letter of the law, which has thereby given us great external salvation, conferred upon us worldly honor and places us in exalted positions in society, we are but moral beings. Before God, we are dishonest and unjust, until we sacrifice and bring ourselves to that order of life, which truly gives us the christian character. Our justification is derived only from being true and honest to principles—true to the convictions of our own souls—the light which we have received, personally. Measuring ourselves by other men, making them standards of righteousness for us, will never give us justification. It is but a foolish attempt to throw off responsibility—an acknowledgment of imbecility.

As truth alone will ultimately prevail, in its wake justice will follow as a reward for every human act. God alone is true. Our only means of justification are in our sacrifices, accepting the teachings of Jesus in all their sternness, making his life our constant example. Thus we enter the paradise of God, walk the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, enjoy the associations of angels, become like them, shorn of all the grossness of a worldly life, redeemed from its generative order, by a baptism into the Christ spirit of the resurrection Order.

SHAKERESS.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

TIME FLIES SWIFTLY.

—o—

IN the infant and childhood state time often hangs heavily, and parents or guardians are necessitated to devise some means by which to beguile the weary hours. I well remember that when a child, Murray's grammar was placed in my hands, and as I was trying to analyze a sentence contained therein, "Time flies, O how swiftly!" how difficult it was for me to understand its import. Oftentimes, when my mind was filled with expectancy concerning some future event which promised pleasure and amusement, weeks seemed like years, days like months, and hours like weeks.

After I had passed one score of years, and the realities of life, its duties and responsibilities began to settle upon me, I often thought of those words, "Time flies swiftly," and felt that they were true. From my present standpoint and experience in life, I look back over the history of half a century and mark the great changes which have been wrought even in our own nation, and it is marvelous to contemplate. Time in its onward march, which to me has quickened its pace year by year, has accomplished great results. Science and Art have been brought to degrees of perfection not then dreamed of. New channels of thought have been opened, which are continually growing broader and deeper. Few are now willing to accept as authority the assertions of any man or woman, without evidence, or to be bound by creedal forms of past centuries.

Many who lived in those times when people were simple in their habits of life, and thought it an honor to honestly till the soil and earn their bread by the sweat of their own brows — fathers who had influence over their sons to hold and keep them as help-meets on the farm until they were of lawful age — look back to those days of primitive simplicity, and ask, Was there not as much real enjoyment in life then as now?

When mothers thought it a duty and made it their pleasure to guide their own household, and teach their daughters practical lessons of industry, how to make good unadulterated bread, "to lay their hands to the spindle and take hold of the distaff" instead of the art of flirtation and gossip — they inquire, Was there not as much virtue and integrity then, as at the present time?

Others, again, have felt that the religion of their fathers was narrow, creed-bound, and sectarian — that it shackled the mind and hindered the soul's expansion and growth — and have prayed sincerely that a radical change might be effected, and pledged themselves to accept the agency through which that change might come. But when they feel the great commotion in the elements and see the irreligious tendencies of the present age, the lack of godly reverence, they almost tremble lest the nation should utterly forget God. It will be well for all to remember that the old heavens cannot pass away and be superseded by the new, without noise and confusion.

All the good and true of the past will remain, but the false must be removed to make room for more light and truth. We find that Apostolic theology and the doctrines of the primitive Church were, at best, incomplete — for the Apostles themselves testified that they only saw and prophesied in part. Since that time they have been mixed up with creeds and dogmas, and have been diluted by a hireling priesthood, to a degree that has rendered them impotent; and they must be tested by the revealed truth of the present day. A prophet said "The day of the Lord will burn as an oven."

Already cremation fires are kindled on the altars of truth, that will consume papal abominations, old heathen mythologies with their pagodas, and the protestant priesthood will see their hitherto well guarded creeds yield to the fervid heat of the fire of truth. All that is false, whether designedly or ignorantly produced, must have its day of judgment.

The dignitaries of what are called Christian Churches have held the consciences of the people with a firm grasp, and swayed the scepter of ecclesiastical power over Christendom, by covering the transgressions and transgressors with a covering not of God's spirit, having hypocrisy for its warp and self-indulgence for its woof, and they have cried "peace, peace," in the ears of all who were willing to listen. Now we see the fruits. Sects have become numerous; but the power that saves from wrong-doing, from selfishness, sensuality and intemperance, is not found, to any great extent, within their precincts; and we view them as so many dead forms, bodies lying in the streets of Christendom, which, being spiritually defined, is Sodom. The witnesses have given away their strength, and the infidel powers are merry.

The priesthood have had their mart, and while many have doubtless been undesigning and sincere in the performance of duty, as a body, they have come in with professional doctors and lawyers for their full share of craft; and under a sanctimonious religious garb have sold their services to the highest bidder.

The same Spirit that gave power unto the two witnesses to shut up the heavens — close the doors to the spirit world for a time — has now re-opened the doors. The Angel seen by the Revelator John, that descended to earth, lightening it with glory, has come down in the nineteenth century and proclaims with a loud voice "Babylon the great is fallen!" Inasmuch as "she has become the hold of foul spirits, a cage for unclean and hateful birds, and has glorified herself and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow are held in reserve, and will be meted out to her."

Spiritualism, in its ancient dress, had its place with the prophets of olden time, and did its work adapted to the day in which they lived. And when these prophets were visited by the Christ Spirit they were inspired with the glorious truths of the coming ages — the veil was lifted from their eyes and they stretched forth their hands while under the prophetic powers which attended them, and pointed to the glory to be revealed, when the harvesting angels would be sent to thrust in the sharp sickle to reap the tares and the wheat which had been suffered to grow together until the harvest. They could only point the way as far as their spiritual telescope permitted them to see it.

The Spiritualism of to-day, in its present form, is a disintegrating power. It is shaking the foundations of the orthodox Churches, and they do not possess vital force enough to withstand the mighty shocks which they are caused to feel from interior spheres. And the prophets of the present time are warning both priests and people to leave the old theological temples built of stones that have never been tested by the rod of truth, as seen in vision by Herman for they cannot stand as they are now organized. "Time flies swiftly," and the spiritual powers are working mightily. In many classes in society there is a fearful looking toward a tribunal which they feel that they must meet, which to them will be a day of sorrow not joy, darkness and not light, for the reason that they are strongly joined to their idols and they want to be let alone, even if their temple and idols all perish together.

Manifold are the thoughts and plans to avert the sequence of the revolutionary tendencies which are at work, and prevent great changes in evangelical councils, in this moving, progressive age. Messengers are sent to distant lands, and oecumenical councils are held, while the ecclesiastical powers of the old and new worlds combine to prevent, if possible, a fatal issue.

Now is the time for the true saints of God to utter the prayer of faith, continue in watching, and fast from the indulgence of inferior passions of body and soul. Let the winds of heaven blow, and separate the chaff from the wheat, the false from the true. When some of the debris of hypocritical profession which has been covered up by anti-Christ is cleared away, a vitalizing, quickening spirit of divine life will energize and uplift humanity, and by practical goodness bring them into communion with God. The Angels of Spiritualism that are guiding the cars of progress call upon all to make ready for their coming.

ABSTINENCE.

—o—

THE Apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Thessalonians, said: "Abstain from all appearance of evil." He also urged the necessity of adding to knowledge, temperance, patience and godliness, and taught that a bishop could not be blameless, unless he became temperate, and that "aged men" in the Church "should be grave and temperate, and the aged women likewise should not be given to much wine, but teachers of good things."

It is a great point to be attained, to be able to act from principle in all things. In eating and drinking, if governed by perverted appetites — either in quality or quantity — instead of the law of use — we cannot be blameless. All sensible people, who have given attention to the subject of dietetics, agree that plain, nutritious food is far more healthful to the human system than that which is highly concentrated; but the plainest, coarsest food may be indulged in to excess, and tend to gluttony. Over-eating, as well as eating improper food at unseasonable hours, is a National sin.

An over-taxed, over-loaded stomach produces torpor, deadens the moral sensibilities, and perverts the mind. Through this medium the feelings, thoughts, words and actions are often forced into wrong channels, and thereby many offenses are given and taken by unkind and misdirected words and acts.

It is evident that inordinate indulgence of the appetites, in either eating or drinking, beclouds the mind and retards the soul's progress into the higher life. Stimulating drinks, of whatever kind, have a tendency to produce nervous excitement, for a time, then to leave a feeling of lassitude and depression. All food is more or less stimulating, necessarily so in order to nourish and give vital force and action. Highly-seasoned food, however palatable it may be, is not a necessity; but when ever indulged in, it engenders disease, which produces suffering, and entails misery upon the human family—one great cause of the degeneracy, in health and morals, at the present time.

The needed reform in this regard will be attained through self-denial only. It is far easier to form correct habits when young than to change erroneous practices, of long standing, in advanced life. Hence, my young friends will bear with me while I exhort them to commence early in life to lay a foundation of good physical health, by Temperance in all things. Thus they may live long in the land, be useful and happy, and acquit themselves honorably, to the satisfaction of mortals and the joy of Angels.

Rosie Morse, Shirley, Mass.

TEMPERANCE.

We feel deeply interested in the Temperance cause. We watch its progress as we read the public prints, and pray for its success. We look upon it as the reformatory movement of the present decade, as the abolition of Slavery was the leading movement of the last decade, in which we witnessed the liberation of four millions of the human race from chattel slavery. We rejoice that this foul stain is so far removed from our land of free institutions.

It now remains for the plague spot of Intemperance to be blotted out, which is in reality more pernicious in effect, morally considered, than Slavery, inasmuch as it is spread over nearly the whole habitable globe, and the high and low, the rich and poor, fall a prey to this great destroyer, and are held by hands stronger than the chains which held the colored race in servile bondage. Those strong chains held the outward forms, and did much to demoralize; but they did not bind the soul and kill the spiritual aspirations of the heart, like alcoholic drink.

Intemperance enslaves and degrades the physical, mental, moral and spiritual powers—spoils the whole—until man and woman, who were formed in the image of God, sink lower in the scale of being than the brute creation. We bless every effort to raise humanity out of such fallen conditions.

We bless, in a special manner, the efforts of women in this direction—the praying bands. We believe they are influenced by the Mother Spirit in Deity, and are sustained by supernatural power, and while they keep humble and lowly in spirit their labors will be blest.

Those who are called into the Resurrection Order, to follow Christ in word and deed, must learn to be temperate in all things; to use every blessing as not abusing it, and be careful that we do not, by misuse, turn blessings into curses.

We are called to lay the ax of truth at the root of the corrupt tree, which bears many kinds of evil fruit, and by a life of self-denial, crucify and rise above all debasing passions and desires—to be free, not only from alcoholic drinks and tobacco, in every form, but from all lusts of body and mind, that would lead the soul from God, and learn to be pure in heart—live in chastity—free from every evil thought and imagination. If we thus fulfill our calling, we shall rejoice in every thing that will tend to elevate the race and lead to a higher life.

Nancy G. Danford, Canterbury, N. H.

WATCH THE THOUGHTS.

THE human mind is ever active. Thoughts ebb and flow like the tidal waves of the ocean. They need watching, and guarding. If kept in a proper channel, under the control of moral principles—natural and spiritual laws—they produce good fruits; and are powerful agents to uplift and restore mankind to a normal, healthy condition of soul and body, from which they have departed, through the indulgence of perverted thoughts, which have given birth to unrighteous deeds. Evil thoughts are the parents of evil deeds. Thoughts, like links in a chain, are connected together, either in the false, or the true.

It is highly important that young minds, in a special manner, should have proper nutrition, and avoid unhealthy stimulants that would excite the brain, and invert the moral and spiritual faculties of the soul. Natural, physical truth, should coalesce with spiritual divine truth; and form a strong magnet to draw and hold intelligences, and operate in concert together, to progress humanity from one degree of knowledge and goodness to another; for all truth is of God.

I am now in the morning of life, and have yet many years before me in this world, if I should only attain unto half the allotted age of man—three score and ten;—and I have a desire to address a few thoughts to my young companions in the gospel work, through the SHAKERESS, and to give expression to feelings of gratitude which well up in my heart, for the many blessings which I am daily enjoying; and for the peace of mind that I find, in walking the path of purity—the highway of holiness.

In obedience to truth, as I have been able to comprehend it, I have found food for mind and body; and have drank of living spiritual waters, which have been sweet to my taste—far sweeter than the transient pleasures of earth. The youthful mind—unrestrained—seeks happiness in things that are vain and perishable. It grasps whatever is fairest, and will yield the greatest amount of pleasure, for the time being, without regard to future consequences. Many of the fairest flowers that bloom, wither and fade in a few short hours, and disappear like a phantom, leaving disappointment—regrets—remorse.

Since I have turned my mind to take counsel of Wisdom and Prudence, which dwell together, I have found, that in the fear of God, and in works of righteousness, are enduring joys. And, as the mind becomes elevated and purified, and learns to subsist upon substantial food, it loses its relish for the artificial, and for the grosser elements; and is more and more able to discern the beauty and excellence of a truly spiritual, and consecrated life. Wisdom's path is indeed pleasant to walk in—peaceful and pure. This path I have chosen, and in it I am joyful—hopeful—and strong. In it I am shielded, in a large degree, from the blighting influences of sin, which bring sorrow and death, to the immortal spirit.

My dear young friends and companions in the Gospel, let us renew our pledges of fidelity to true principles, and henceforth, let our lives be hid with Christ, under the covert of Truth.

Martha A. Burger, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

REFLECTIONS.

AT the close of an Autumn day, I was led to admire the beauty of the sky, and to gaze upon the azure realms on high, until their opal brightness slowly faded from my view; but the variegated clouds were held within my thoughts as by a holy magnet. I fancied that in the whole wide world, there was nothing that could compare, in beauty, with the sky of evening, as the sun slowly faded in the west.

I then turned my thoughts to my Zion home, and reflected upon the glories of the self-conqueror! And to my mind, I beheld beauties as bright, serene and peaceful, as the golden twilight. I then asked, Are the acts of my life fully controlled by Gospel principle, am I so moulded and fashioned by spiritual power that my whole being is brought into activity under rays of divine light—that the deeds which I perform may appear as stars, twinkling in the light—illuminated with tints of goodness?

Ah! there is toil for me—much labor to perform. While stirred to more fervor by these reflections, I resolve now in the morning of life, to consecrate myself anew, to be fruitful in good works—to keep my heart with all diligence—that it may be a receptacle of love and light; and that I may possess the true adorning which attends the perfection of goodness.

Thus, I shall possess the treasures of holiness, the reward of consecration—the wealth that truth will give. The spring time of life, if spent in true devotion, will be fraught with glory and strength. And as years roll on, by continued growth in all that is true and good, beneath celestial rays and Angels' care—I may continue, an indweller in the temple of God, to go no more out forever.

Lydia Staples, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

RIGHT AND WRONG.

IT is written, "The way of the transgressor is hard," and that "Wisdom's ways are pleasantness and her paths peace." When the mind is rightly directed, it is far easier to do right than to do wrong. Right leads in the straight-forward path of life and duty; error leads into the by-ways of sin, and among hedges.

Right dwells, walks and is conversant with her followers, as with companions; never forsaking them in adversity. She attires them in robes of honor, and crowns them with immortal glory.

Wrong tempts and allures her votaries with fair promises of happiness and pleasure, that are never realized. Her greatest pleasures leave a sting behind. Her reward is pain and misery. She clothes her subjects with degradation and shame.

The old theory, that it is hard and disagreeable to do right, is false—a device of satan's own planning to deceive and captivate souls and retard their progress. It is true, educated as most children are, pernicious habits are formed in early life; hence many difficulties are experienced by such, in seeking to do right, and effort, self-denial and moral courage are requisite to remove obstacles, which appear formidable; but a wise, determined energy to do right will bring a recompense—a just reward.

E. A. Stratton, Canterbury, N. H.

IF WE FORGIVE NOT, CAN WE HOPE TO BE FORGIVEN?

THERE is no virtue more essential to the Christian character than Forgiveness. It smoothes life's journey, inspires hope in the forgiven, and shows forth nobility of character in the forgiver. The gifted Sterne, discoursing on the excellence of a forgiving spirit, said: "The brave only, know how to forgive; it is the most refined and generous pitch of virtue that human nature can arrive at. Cowards have done good and kind actions; but a coward never forgave. It is not in his nature to do it. The power to do it flows from a strength and greatness of soul, conscious of its own force and security, rising above the temptation of resenting every little affront."

When Jesus taught His disciples to pray, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us," how plainly he exhibited the law of justice as running parallel with mercy. Truth and Love, Righteousness and Peace, are copartners.

It is not probable that any human being was ever created so perfect, in every respect, as never to have committed an error—never to have sinned in a degree to fall short of the glory of God, and of the love and confidence of some mortal being. If this be true, then all, in a greater or less degree, have felt the need of the exercise of this beautiful virtue toward them. Those who humble their spirits, and seek forgiveness, will be exalted thereby. It is a sweet boon, when attained, worth the effort.

Bitter envy and strife—jealousy and hard feelings—never made any soul noble nor happy. But when we kindly take an erring, repentant brother, or sister, by the hand, breathe the spirit of forgiveness and love, speak words of kindness to them, remembering that "to err is human, to forgive, divine," then we feel the sweet consolation which the Christ Spirit—the Dove of Peace—alone can give.

[For the Shaker and Shakeress.]

DEAR EDITORS:

I was much edified and comforted, while perusing the excellent article on the "Gift of Tongues and the Gift of Healing" in the March number of your valuable paper. I love the cause of truth, and am interested in its increase; and I would work to promote it, but I find that my best efforts are feeble.

I have faith in Spiritual Gifts. Four years ago I attended a Spiritual Convention in St. Paul, Minn. I there met with three young women who were called Mediums. They sang and talked in the Indian tongue, greatly to my satisfaction. I was convinced that they were entirely ignorant of the language, except as they were influenced by other minds. I have also been used as an instrument to help the sick and maimed, by laying on of hands, which was effected through faith, and by earnest prayer.

For many years I have been seeking for an increase of light and truth. I formerly believed that "Christ would come in the literal clouds of heaven," and set up his kingdom on earth, to reign a thousand years, and my mind was much exercised concerning that event; for I believed the prophetic periods were fulfilled. About that time I obtained the book entitled "Millennial Church." From it I received much light concerning the manner—not the time—of the Second Advent. Instead of looking for Christ to appear personally, in the atmospheric clouds of earth, I turned my eyes to look for a spiritual appearing in a cloud of witnessing Saints—"Clouds of Witnesses to compass us about, and Saviours that would come upon Mt. Zion to judge the Mt. of Esau"—the heavenly would judge the earthly.

From that time to the present I have been in unison with Believers (or Shakers) in feeling and in practical life, as far as circumstances would permit. Family ties and temporal conditions have prevented me from walking in close relationship, and now, while I am writing, there are mountains and valleys which divide us; yet I try to commune with you in spirit. I am also trying, in my feeble way, to influence people here in Winona, who believe it is their duty to live in the marriage relation, to regard the law of Nature, which is use, and I think my efforts in this direction have not been entirely fruitless.

There is a spiritual song—from which I have derived much comfort—that I understand originated in your Society. With your permission I would be pleased to have it appear in the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS:

"On the beautiful hills of Truth we will roam,
For there the sweet flowers of purity bloom;
We'll gather the immortal fruits that there grow,
And drink of the "well-springs of life" that flow;
We'll inhale the pure breezes of that healthful
clime,
And unite in the strains of music divine.
O, there is our home! when life's conflicts are o'er,
We'll join our blest kindred who've passed on before."

Cornelia L. Clark, Winona, Minn.

COMPLIANCE.

—o—

THE Laws of God are immutable—unchangeable—as the source whence they proceed. Those laws are not only operative upon large bodies of mind and matter, but descend to, and take cognizance of, small objects and atoms. It is said: "Not a sparrow falls to the ground unnoticed." Hence, obedience to the laws, in small, as well as in things of greater moment, is necessary to secure the blessing. All causes, whether great or small, will produce their legitimate effects.

King Solomon said: "Train up a child in the way he (or she) should go, and when he (or she) is old he (or she) will not depart from it"—implying that impressions first stamped upon the mind and memory are not soon erased. If children are taught obedience to that which is right and just, in little things, a foundation of character is laid for after life; and it is far easier for those who have rendered fealty to parents and guardians, while in a juvenile state, to regard law and order, when, at more mature age, they engage in the duties of life, in an enlarged sphere of action, whether it be in social relations—governmental, or religious—there are laws pertaining to each, and all.

Is there not, therefore, an important duty, which guardians of children and youth are bound to feel in regard to them, which few seem to realize? Do not the inmates of jails, and prison houses, strongly rebuke the fathers who begot, and the mothers who bore them—then neglected and left them, half cultured—half subdued, if subdued at all—to grow up in self-will, and non-compliance with the desires of their parents or guardians?

As a general rule, children who are allowed to disobey their parents, and disregard the counsel and admonition of friends, do not listen to the voice of conscience in the soul, and are left to be tossed upon the billows of their passionate natures, subject to the winds that are created in the haunts of vice; and often, intoxicating drink, which fevers the brain, and sets on fire the animal, sensual passions, tempts—allures—and draws them into a vortex of vice, from which it is not easy for them to extricate themselves.

I am happy, at every recollection, that I was taught the principle of obedience, in early life. My parents placed me under the care and guardianship of Believers, when I was but three years of age. With a firm hand they led me—in wisdom counseled me—and in love, chided me for my faults, and taught me to yield my will and judgment to my superiors, and to those of riper age. In compliance with those instructions, I was shielded from harm, and my young life was peaceful and pleasant.

Now, that I have passed beyond the childhood state, reason and conscience call for a continuation of the principle of Obedience. There are physical, moral and spiritual laws, which we must obey, if we would enjoy health and happiness. A departure therefrom, always result in pain and suffering. I have full confidence that the observance of Law—natural and spiritual—will restore Order and harmony, bring souls into union with God, and establish just relations in the human family.

Ellen Green, Canaan, N. Y.

"CONSIDER THE LILIES."

—o—

SLUMBERING in restful quiet—under the pure white mantle of snow—what miracles of wonder are reposing! Miracles, scarce less wonderful than that of creation, await only the genial, magnetic rays of the sun, to astonish us with their beauty. First will come the violets, and then, the crocuses and tulips, from their wonderful bulbs.

Every one has its own marked characteristic individuality—its own perfect life—to spring forth, to bud, to open and exhale its little wealth of bloom and fragrance, and then retire. So of all Nature's creations, in their simple state, be they bird or beast. They know their time, fulfill their life of freedom, and then retire. And does it seem probable that the wise Creator ever intended that his last and crowning work of completeness should have less of the spirit of spontaneity than inferior things?

Must she, because time was when her charm was in her dependence, ever be doomed to rob herself of the health and stamina—back bone—which her cares—her duties—so urgently demand of her?

To every mortal the message comes: "Each Soul to its Maker." No sponsor can answer for another, before "the great white throne," for "the deeds done in the body," each one must account for himself or herself.

To live out our ideal of perfected man, or womanhood, physically, mentally and spiritually, is the call of God to our souls. If indifferent, and supine, on us will come the results—condemnation—for misimproved talents, and unfulfilled uses; for "I have called you to freedom," and have given you every needed good that you might "grow as the lily" and obtain all the possibilities of life and being.

E. H. Webster, Harvard, Mass.

TALENT.

—o—

A CHRISTIAN community need, and have a right to, every faculty and talent. And no one who holds membership in such community can, in justice to that community, to his or her self, or to mankind, withhold or bury his or her talents, whether they be few or many. No one, through pride, because he or she does not possess as much as some others, can be justified in withholding what to him or her was committed. "God will require his own with usury," whether it be little or much.

Unless talent be put to use, it is of no avail. Life in this way will be a blank; and when called upon for a just account of Stewardship, those who have thus lived will receive the sentence "Unprofitable servant."

Talent, though small, if well improved, is a blessing. In what better way can we honor God, the Giver of all good gifts, than to be active in duty? giving with a liberal hand of what we possess, and diligently seeking to add thereto, that we may have more to give? If we are only able to hand in a cup of water, in a right spirit, we shall not lose the reward of so doing; we shall hear the comforting voice speaking to the conscience, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

C. F. Hall, Canterbury, N. H.

FEELING SUBORDINATE TO PRINCIPLE.

—o—

PRINCIPLE is the foundation of character. It should rule personal feeling, and govern the motions and actions, in the performance of every duty. Small particles of earth form great mountains. Little thoughts and feelings produce actions—deeds—which form and determine character. Though separately considered they may appear small as a grain of sand, yet they are the moulding element of the human mind, and should be of such type as to fit us for the companionship of each other, and for the society of Angels.

Scripture teaches that "The tree is known by its fruit." A tree must have roots, else it could not live. Are not principles, which are the basis of character, like the roots of a tree and the external conduct the fruit produced? It has been said "A good man, out of the treasure of the heart, bringeth forth good things; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure, bringeth forth evil things." "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

How important that in early life we should study to understand the necessity of bringing our feelings and inner life under discipline. It is as essential to our moral and spiritual development as pure air and wholesome food are requisite for physical growth.

If we would be substantial members of society, we must begin in the spring-time of life and build securely upon good principles, regardless of personal feelings which would often lead us to deviate from the right. It would be well for young persons who are commencing life's journey, to consider this subject and give it due weight.

They, who in childhood and youth have been blest with the influence of moral and spiritual teachers, should be admonished to bear those instructions in mind as they advance in life, and to bring every feeling into subjection to principle, in "obedience to the law of Christ." This will require vigilance and self-denial, which will give growth to virtue and leave no room for idleness either of body or mind. Thus we shall be able to help bear the burdens of society and show by our works an unselfish devotion to principle and love of God and humanity.

THE CROSS MY CHOICE.

—o—

The cross of Jesus I'll bear,
I'll bind it near to my heart;
His yoke voluntarily wear,
And in his service take part.
I'll yield up all my unto him,
And walk in the straight, narrow way
That his shining goal I may win,
In regions of eternal day.

Earth shall not my progress impede,
Nor hinder my journey above;
I'll hie me on ever with speed,
To that land of light and of love,
Where Ann and where Jesus have gone,
And all ancient Saints onward press'd;
And where, 'mid the glorified throng,
Our own spirit kindred are blest.

O beautiful home that I see!
I fain would take wings, and away
From earth and its shadows to thee—
To substance that ne'er will decay.

GOSPEL INCREASE

—o—

BRIGHT angels are passing through the earth, to and fro,
Proclaiming God's Word that all nations must know;
Yea, hearing the Law that will bring lasting peace,
And establish his kingdom which never will cease—
Never will cease to flourish and grow,—
Until the whole earth is an Eden below;
Never will cease in its growth of love,
Till mortals are like unto angels above.

'Tis but by the cross, self-denial and truth,
The soul is renewed, and brought back to its youth;
And by the deep love which the Saviour possessed,
The earth is to bloom, and its fruitage be blessed,
Put on your whole strength, O ye earnest and bold!
The seed must be sown, that its life may unfold;
The chosen of God, have his work to perform,
Yet, He will protect them from ev'ry wild storm.

For thus 'tis decreed, the true laborer shall rise, Though scorned and derided—and covered with lies;
No mortals have power to harm or destroy
Those who for the truth all their forces employ.
Those who come forth to march in the van,
By angels are guided in God's holy plan.
Courage, brave-hearted, be fearless and true!
The Lord is your strength, and will bring you safe through;
Eternally yours, his kingdom of peace,
Of which there's to be an abiding increase.
Eternally yours—his kingdom of love—
As starry and broad as the blue arch above;
Rapturous joy, none but victors can tell,
What the anthem contains, which their glad voices swell!
None but the heroes who've ended the strife,
Are crowned with the laurels of immortal life!
Julia Johnson, Hancock, Mass.

"BE CAREFUL WHAT YOU SAY."

[Selected.]

In speaking of others' faults
Pray don't forget your own;
Remember those in house of glass,
Seldom should throw a stone.
If we have nothing else to do
But talk of those who sin,
'Tis better we commence at home,
And from that point begin.
We have no right to judge a man
Until he's fairly tried;

Should we not like his company,
We know the world is wide.
Some may have faults—and who has not?
The old as well as young.
Perhaps we may, for aught we know,
Have fifty to their one.

I'll tell you of a better plan;
I find it works full well,
To try my own defects to cure—
Before of others tell.
And though I sometimes hope to be
No worse than some I know,
My own short-comings bid me let
The faults of others go.
Then let us all when we commence
To slander friend or foe,
Think of the harm one word may do,
To those we little know.

CROWN OF MOTHER'S LOVE.

—o—

DEAR SHAKER AND SHAKERESS:

In newspapers, as in houses, are corners.
If you have a little corner left—unoccupied—please insert "Crown of Mother's Love"—if you deem it worthy of such a privilege.

Receive our best wishes for your prosperity.
We, here at White Water, are deeply interested in your welfare. Through your aid our views of Shakerism are being expanded.
Shakerism never appeared more beautiful to us, than at the present time.

Take all the jewels earth can hoast;
Its diamonds and its pearls so bright;
Search southern sea and northern coast—
Bring all their treasures to the light;
Collect them—call them all thine own;
Display to all the eyes that see,
Yet will they not heft the crown
Which Mother's Love hath set on me.

The jewels in my crown that shine,
That sparkle in bright glory there,
Shed on my path those rays divine,
Which make life beautiful and fair.
Thine were from mount and ocean brought,
And won by risk of other's life;
With mine own heart's blood, mine I've bought
And paid for in the gospel strife.

O, glitt'ring crown of Mother's Love,
I press thee to my joyful heart
What'er hefall—where'er I move,
Dearer than gold to me thou art.
Earth from my sight thy gems remove;
They do not shine for one like me;
For mine's the pearl of heav'nly Love,
The sparkling gem of Purity!

WHITE WATER, February 1, 1875.

A newspaper is, in fact, almost as much the production of one mind as a book, for though there may be fifty different pens engaged in furnishing the matter which goes into it, it is the individual tact of the conductor that gives it all consistency, that hots out all objectionable sentences, and adds the necessary words here and there to elucidate and give point to what would otherwise be obscure and meaningless.

The editor of the London Times is not by any means a brilliant writer; there are doubtless many men under him who can excel in writing leaders, reporting speeches, or doing the miscellaneous work of a daily journal, but probably not one who could conduct that famous paper with the success he has secured to it. The proprietors properly appreciate his services, and his salary is equal to that of the President of the United States.

TOOLS—TEMPORAL AND SPIRITUAL.

MAN has been defined as a tool-making animal. Certain it is, that no other animal fabricates so great a variety of tools, as does the head of the animal creation—Man.

If this be granted, may it not be that the progress of our race, from the Nomad, or Savage state, toward the highest form of civilization, is indicated by the tools, including machinery, and by the inventive ingenuity displayed in their construction?

The degree of progress, as thus indicated, made by an individual, will be nowhere more clearly expressed—better, or more sharply defined—than in a Shaker Family.

The Brother, who comprehends and appreciates the full value of a tool, will prove his comprehension and appreciation by the care exhibited in the use of it, and by the disposal made of it when not in use.

Property is largely the result of the invention, construction and care of tools. Rich and poor are terms that simply express the acquired, or improved natural capacity for making and employing tools, in accomplishing the purposes of life.

Individuals, coming from the outside world, into a Shaker organization, soon manifest their status, as regards being self supporting, or dependent upon the labor and care of others, by their relation to tools.

The selection of a light tool for heavy work, by which it is soon broken, or spoiled; or of a heavy tool for a light job, in which the strength is exhausted before the work is accomplished, determines their inefficiency.

Again, is the tool set in a proper place and position, when not in hand? When done with, is it cleaned and cared for according to its value and importance?

These are vital considerations, affecting the character of the brother who has the tool in possession,—temporary, or permanent. Often, light implements, when out of hand, are thrown down to be lost, or broken by being driven over.

Sometimes, tools are wrongfully employed to strike dumb animals, to the injury of the man, the tool and the animal. Such things ought not so to be.

A careful enumeration of each tool used in a given job, so that all may be replaced, in good order, when the work is done, is profitable in a property point of view, and commendable as a Christian practice.

Of Father Joseph, it is recorded, that he joined to each act and step, a thought of its use. If, in the day of judgment, an account be rendered of every idle word, will not preceding thought avert the idle words?

To us, now is the day of judgment. Let us not despise it, by inattention to small things.

What is Spiritualism but a science, instrument, or TOOL to be used in the great work of human redemption? It originated among Believers, did its work for seven years, went into the world, with a promise of its return to Zion—was operative, both here and there, through earthly mediums—natural seers and seeresses.

Is not the return, thus prophesied of, at hand? And will not the next step, of demonstration, be in the form of materialization? These are the questions to be answered—the problems to be solved.

Man comes into being, like the beasts that perish—helpless, dependent and ignorant. The Spiritual faculty exists in him, as a germ, to be unfolded in the future.

In Catholicism, was the perversion of the Spiritualism of the Primitive Church. Protestantism was a protest against Spiritualism, per se, because of such perversion. It compounded, into one system, the incongruous elements of great faith in past revelations of God, with infidel denial of all present revelation—of the existence of a living, pulsating Spirit World, with whose inhabitants the good and the bad could hold intelligent intercourse.

Protestantism is abnormally materialistic—earthy—was and is “the second beast that came up out of the earth with power like a Lamb, and like a Lion—of opposite characteristics—believes in no Prophet, until it has killed him. Then it worships him—even as it incorporates animals into its own body, after it has taken their lives. It will give Christian burial to those whom it has slain in heathen warfare—will deal kindly—tenderly—with the men it has wounded and maimed, with infernal instruments—tools—in unchristian battles.

In this Babylon, one of the two sexes esteems the other as created for their own use, as part of the animal creation. Yet, that sex brings the other into being and nurses them into masters, who make the Laws and execute them.

Protestantism apportions the earth to the few, and feeds the non-producers—aristocrats, soldiers, criminals and paupers—out of the charity that should have equally divided the land, the product whereof it now unequally divides. Is there not incongruity in this system, that materialization will remedy?

“THOU SHALT NOT KILL.”

OUR Gospel Messenger—The Shaker and Shakeress—like the tree of life, yielding its twelve manners of fruits—Christian Virtues,—twelve times each year, is before me. And what a feast it affords!—experiences, declarations of living faith, and progressive ideas, drawn from Christ, the living fountain, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

The two-edged sword of the Spirit, severing, from the soul, the sins and elements of the world, with the habits incorporated into our life system, by long usages, is ably wielded. And as its keen edge is felt, separating us from our self-loves, who wonders we cringe, feel pain and cry out to the Prophets, “Speak unto us smooth things”—when likely to lose a darling idol, whether of food, or some long cherished theologic idea?

I well remember that Elder Frederick once told a Boston audience—“We Shakers are learning to become good and true Christians.” This is true.

Were the revelations of God, through Mother Ann, a finality, any more than the mission of Jesus was God’s Last Will and Testament?

There can never be a departure, with impunity, from the foundational principles of the Church established by Mother Ann and those who helped to plant the Gospel in this land—Virgin life, community of interest and SEPARATION from the world. To prepare our bodies, as fit tabernacles for the temple of the Holy Spirit, in which God may be worshiped in the beauty of holiness, there is yet much to learn.

Many evils, already abandoned, show the progress made. Prominent among them, are Cider and Pork—Tobacco, almost obsolete—Use of drugs greatly diminished—many believing they can die happier without doctors, if not quite as quick. Lingerings are many habits, yet to be abandoned. Slaughtering animals for food!—Is it not a barbarism, unbecoming our profession, which Believers will abandon?

Did not the Prophet allude to the Church of Christ in the second Manifestation—the “New Heavens”—when he said, “They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain”—“He that killeth an Ox is as he that slayeth a man”—“Violence shall no more be heard in thy land—wasting and destruction within thy borders”—“Thy walls shall be salvation and thy gates praise?”

Some, from inherited disease, may not be prepared to abstain, wholly, from animal food. As many as are able to abstain—LET them.

Has not the time arrived when the Virgin Sons of Zion should keep their hands from pollution of blood guiltiness? Are we, in building New Heavens, to retain slaughter-houses and executioners?

Every Society and Family employing hirelings, more or less,—until we are sufficiently progressed to leave the use of animal food entirely—Let the slaughtering be done entirely by the hirelings, who still live in the generative order. And let the Sons of Zion, who have confessed their sins and are living the pure Angelic life, be exempt from imbuing their hands in blood—violently taking the life of any animal. Are they not called to become a holy Prophetic Priesthood—to be daily rising in the resurrection—keeping themselves unspotted from every pollution of the world, its habits and fashions—keeping their hands clean and their hearts pure—progressing on from perfection to perfection—possessing their souls in innocence—becoming deeply spiritual and so filled with the Holy Ghost that their very countenances shall be radiant with the Glory of God, realizing the call of God, to plant vineyards and eat the fruit thereof?

Then shall Peace be as a river, and Righteousness as a flowing stream—and nations will come up to Zion, to behold her Glory, and the Lord will rejoice in the increasing purity of his People.

A MAN WHO NEVER TASTED MEAT.

—O—

ONE half-mile south of Holmesdorf, Pa., lives an old farmer by the name of Abraham Blatt, who is about sixty years of age, is healthy, robust and as strong as a horse, who has never in his lifetime tasted the least bit of meat of any kind. He says he never tasted beef, pork, mutton, or veal, no kind of poultry, no kind of fish, no kind of game, in fact nothing pertaining to meat. He has such an abhorrence of meat that when they kill a cow or hog on his premises, he generally leaves home and goes about other business. He is the father of a large family, all healthy children. Among the lot is also one boy, who, like his father, eats no meat of any kind. In reply to the questions put to the father how he could work so hard without eating any meat, he says he believes he is much healthier than if he ate meat. He uses very little butter.

The popular error that flesh meat creates more muscular strength than do grains, fruit, or vegetables, was equaled by the once popular belief, that to the farmers and hard working laborers, Alcoholic drink was a positive necessity.

We are apt to forget to reflect. The Horse after his kind. The Ox and Buffalo; the Camel and Dromedary; the Elephant and Mastodon, were and are Graminivorous. Do they lack muscle, as compared with the Carnivora?

Is the fact, that no animal living habitually upon other animals, will ever work, presumptive evidence that Man, who performs so much physical labor, does not belong to the Carnivora, and that he will progress beyond it?

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER,

Along with this I send you a few papers as a second article on Diet. Deal with it as you are directed by Spirit Monition. I have done as you desired, viz., I have written, and as you have predicted, the writing has done me good. It is away from me, and there my responsibility ceases, while yours begins. Understand me clearly, I have no desire to be seen in print, before I can better bear inspection by the spirit-eyes that are constantly upon me. I have much, oh how much! to regret having ever given occasion to spirit-eyes to witness in me. But I sincerely thank God that I have entered the valley of humiliation, and find something sweet even in the very bitterness of confession and repentance. My intercourse with the Spirit Sphere increases in power, in quantity and delight. The power and influence that draws me thither grows visibly stronger every day, and the river grows wider that bears me on its bosom to the Ocean of Being. Last evening, in our family circle of three, viz., myself, wife and little daughter—among other friendly messages from on high, we had one from Ann Lee, inquiring after my health, as she had not time that night to visit me in person. I need scarce tell you how delighted I was, and still am. I have suffered pretty much through ill-health this season; but it seems as if any amount of ill-health almost would be welcome to me, that brought with it the expressed sympathy of Ann Lee. I am following instructions sent by Ann Lee in regard to medicine and diet, and find benefit therefrom; but my chief joy is, that it will not be very long now before I go to live beside my spirit guides and instructors; this is a joy so great to me as to leave little room for any other joy to possess me at the same time. Except it be that I too may become a blessed instrument for Good, in the service of my Father and Mother God. I send you regularly the Harbinger of Light. I trust that it reaches you safely—but there again I am wrong. When it leaves me, it is in the keeping of Him who keeps all things, and will therefore, of necessity, go on its proper mission. When last in Melbourne, I found one with whom I previously had corresponded, till he allowed the correspondence to drop. He was actively engaged in the promotion of a co-operative, or communistic, scheme, called "Aurelia." My remarks and replies to his and other correspondence were not in harmony as they then thought with a more rational mode of procedure recommended. But here again disappointment has brought reconsideration, and this person, a widower, seeks for a higher basis on which to build. While pointing out to him the foundation-stone—Christ, I referred him also to you, as both able and willing to assist by counsel and advice. His name is William Yates, and from all I can learn, if he does not succeed in obtaining a communistic home in this colony soon, he is likely to visit you. He promised to follow my advice in writing to you. So you see, dear Brother, I have no thought of sparing you. We, that is, Catherine and myself, read with great satisfaction your messenger of love, the SHAKER AND SHAKER-ESS. Will you, dear Brother, remember Catherine and myself, in love to all the fraternity of Brothers and Sisters at Mount Lebanon? We shall meet you, by-and-by, at the holy Mount Zion above. As it is, we are often with you now, dark and dimly, it is true. Still we can make you out, and through the gloom of this night-side of Nature hear your friendly hail, "All's well"—"All's well." And so it is, dear friends all, it is really, truly, and everlastingly—"All's well."

For a brief time again, we bid you all Farewell.

John (and Catherine) Finlay.

A FEW THOUGHTS ON DIET.

—O—

IN my last, I spoke of food being decomposed before it left the system. To this some may offer the objection that the decomposition effected by digestion differs widely from that effected by putrescence. While admitting this difference in its widest extent, it still remains a fact, that the law runs parallel in both cases, i. e., the decomposition effected by either process is most hateful to all our senses of observation in animal substance, next so in animalized substances; then in roots, vegetables, etc. The whole may be summed up thus: The lowest condition of human existence will be exhibited in

ATMOSPHERE.

In small, badly ventilated bed-rooms, especially over-crowded ones. Air, over-charged in drinking rooms, with fetid breath of gin, rum and beer drinkers; tobacco smokers and chewers, products of combustion, defective drainage, etc.

DRINKS.

Ardent spirits, alcoholic drinks, fermented liquors, stagnant water, and water defiled by contact with decayed or decaying matter, through bad drainage, etc.

FOOD.

Blood, livers, hearts, flesh of swine, especially those fed on garbage, half putrescent and badly cooked animal food and roots.

UNNATURAL AND ACQUIRED HABITS.

Smoking or chewing tobacco, taking snuff, opium, narcotics, bitters, etc.

The highest possible condition on earth,

AN EXCLUSIVELY FRUIT DIET.

The rationale of this however, is: Do not attempt to stride over the Andes at one step. The path upward and onward is not only progressive, but constant and eternal. There is a "Hill of Difficulty" for every pilgrim to climb, and perhaps an equally good name for this "Hill" would be the hill of Self-Denial. He or she, that would live to God, must take up the cross daily. Never look back like Lot's wife, or the foolish Israelites, to the flesh-pots, the leeks and garlic of Egypt. Press onward, ever upward and forward. "Nearer my God to Thee," be all thy song, be all thy life's effort. And when at any time the weakness of the flesh may cause thee to stumble—though you should even get drunk and debauch your stomach—rise and shake the dirt from you, do not elect to roll down the hill again into the filth at the bottom from which you have, in part ascended with so much effort. Fools and sinners will laugh and scoff, they will invite you to descend lower again into their own depths; heed them not. Sing with the Apostle, "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, when I fall I shall arise again." Speed onward again and again. If you fall a thousand times, make one thousand and one efforts to go forward, and sure as fate you will succeed. Remember, your better life must be a daily progress, not a single act; and it is only by degrees that you can overcome self. Again, remember that all natures are not alike. In some persons the process of assimilation with new kinds of food, goes on more slowly than with others, and a mixture of that very kind of food you mean to abandon, may for a time be necessary for you. The mixture may of course be purified gradually, till in course of years, the old element be completely eliminated. You must be guided by conscience and due regard to possibilities combined. In all reform however, observe the golden rule of charity to your neighbor; never rejoice at, nor magnify his fall. Judge yourself with the utmost severity, but let charity be ever with you in judging your neighbor.

Lastly, whatever indulgences in old habits you may conscientiously require, not as a deliberate sacrifice to devils, but as a real mile stone of progress, to give you fresh strength as it were in all good faith and conscience to go forward—never on any single occasion let the eyes of young persons ever find you so engaged. With the young, example is all-powerful. Let them as much as possible be surrounded with an atmosphere of purity and kept free from all that is even suggestive of evil.

AUSTRALIA.

P. S. It may be well to remark, that it is quite possible the utmost power in humanity for reform and being manifestation, might require three generations in the effort to produce a true frugivorous race of beings.

SHAKER VILLAGE, MER. CO., N. H.,
February 15, 1875.

BELOVED ELDER FREDERICK:

I have written a few thoughts upon Ventilation, which I forward to you for perusal, and hope that as you read you will be kind enough to criticise, erase, add or diminish, as the case may require—or consign them to the waste-basket. I shall not feel slighted at any measures you may take to make all right. I have tried to handle the subject as candidly as I could, and leave out the sweeping remarks that would very naturally glide from my pen, when it is moved on by thoughts that burn with indignation, as they sometimes do when obliged to sing in a close atmosphere.

I have envied the Chameleon in the fable, where the writer states that "He saw him eat the air for food"—provided it was pure air—many times when thus engaged.

If there could be some simple means devised for ventilating our large assembly rooms, especially, I would slug praise to God for the means.

These long, inclement winters in Northern New England create such a scarcity in fuel, that it is considered wasteful, by the majority, to open windows and doors for the admission of air, and doing thus, expose some, in a crowded room, to much inconvenience from drafts, which induce colds, etc.

Our Meeting Room, as yet, has no means for ventilation, except by raising and lowering the window sashes, and, it being low posted, it is rarely that it is, or can be, well aired, while the audience is assembled, without great inconvenience to some one, or ones. Our Brethren, though in favor of good air (or the theory), are not yet able to decide on any particular method for ventilation, which will supersede lowering or raising the sash. We sisters have pleaded for our rights to breathe, more than any other rights, save the rights vouchsafed to the virgin life. And since having made the art of breathing a study in the "Vocal Drill," as taught by Dr. Guilmette, we are more keenly alive to the benefits arising from pure air. Could this theory be accepted throughout Believers, I believe there would be a greater revolution in the physical habits of many, than that which herbs, drugs, or quack medicines can induce.

Asking pardon for my long talk, I beg you to accept herewith a renewal of love from our beloved Elders, Brethren and Sisters.

Your Shaker Sister,

Aseneth C. Stickney.

WHAT better evidence than is contained in this private note, that ours is the Everlasting Gospel?

It was not until Woman became converted to the high and holy vocation of Christian Celibacy, that the Resurrection of mankind became an assured fact—a fulfilled prophecy.

Man may appoint, but Woman can disappoint. Man may beget—Woman alone can bring forth. The stars of heaven fell continually to the earth, throughout the long night of Anti-Christ. They ceased in Israel until I arose, until that I, Deborah arose, a Mother in Israel.

Now that the Sisterhood begin to add to their Spiritual faith the virtues of physiological truths, we look, without a doubt, for the Gospel to increase. To cleanliness in the house, not easily exceeded, will now be added a purity of atmosphere in those houses, like the purity of life in the Sisterhood, which is Angelic.

EDITOR.

DR. MILLER'S CONVERSION.

DEAR SEVERAL EVANS:

For several years I have been an opponent of Spiritualism. I believed it was all the work of deceivers and frauds. I had seen so much deception amongst those who called themselves mediums, and so many who had been made converts by these frauds, that I had come to the conclusion that all so-called mediums were deceivers. I had, on several occasions, been selected by public audiences to act on committees to test the manifestations of mediums, and had, on almost every occasion, found in these mediums such evidences of fraud, that I had lost faith in the whole of them.

I had examined several mediums in private, and among them the Hough boy at Apollo Hall before 2,000 people, and at Tammany Hall I was chosen to test Warren. All the parties mentioned positively refused to submit to the tests I thought necessary to convince me that their manifestations were not tricks. I still think the mediums referred to, many times, practiced deceptions on their audiences. In December last I went to Chittenden, Vermont, to see the Eddy brothers, and I expected to find the biggest kind of a fraud there. When I left home I expected to be gone three or four days, and to be able to come back and show just how they managed to deceive those who go to see them; but, to my surprise, when I had been there that time, I found I did not know any thing about how it was done.

The result of my visit was, I staid fifteen days and came away thoroughly convinced that however much deception and trickery there might be amongst other mediums, there was something genuine at the Eddys. I staid there long enough to examine every thing about the séance room, as well as every part of the premises, and I am now fully satisfied that spirits do materialize, and large numbers of them too, and they appear in substantial form, can be seen and felt, and heard to speak, and they are recognized by their friends, and often take them by the hands and kiss them and give the most positive assurances of their identity.

During the fifteen days I was there, I saw as many as twelve different spirits a night come out and show themselves. There were representatives of several different nations, amongst them were Egyptians, Italians, Hungarians, Indians, Americans, Europeans and Asiatics. Some of those who were present saw and recognized their own friends, and conversed with them about matters with which none but they and their friends were familiar. Mrs. Eddy, the mother of the Eddy brothers, came out several times, and one night she spoke for half an hour nearly, and some of the time she spoke so loud she could be heard more than twenty yards distant. Honto, an Indian girl, came out several times, and on different occasions she danced, played on musical instruments, materialized shawls and other articles, smoked a pipe, shook hands with different persons, kissed them, sat in their laps, and did many other things. No one could have made me believe that what I saw there was the work of spirits materialized, if I had not seen them with my own eyes, and felt them with my own hands, for I was a regular doubting Thomas. I could not believe except I could test them with all my own senses. This I had a chance to do at Chittenden, Vt.

What, then, are the proofs of spirit manifestations that I saw there? Let me sum them up in a few words. The medium goes into a closet twenty-seven inches wide and seven feet long, that is lathed and plastered on the sides and on the ceiling, with only one small window, and that is covered with a piece of netting, so sealed, that no one could disturb it without its being known, and a door for the medium to enter. The floor and every part is examined and is found in such a condition that no one could get into it except through the door. The closet is examined before the medium goes into it, the medium is examined before he goes in, and we know he has nothing about him but his ordinary clothes on. The séance room is made about as dark as it would be with an ordinary fire in a grate. Within a few minutes after the medium goes in, out comes form after form till as many as thirty-five have come out in one evening. They laugh, dance, sing, jump about, play on musical instruments, materialize shawls and various articles, recognize their friends, talk with them, give them advice, etc., etc. These spirit forms appear and disappear while you are looking at them, as Jesus is said to disappear after the resurrection while talking with the disciples. Hands, arms and faces appear and vanish instantly; the names of your own friends are written on cards by these hands, amongst those to whom you have never mentioned the name of one of your friends, either living or dead; musical instruments are moved about the room, passing over your head, all the time discoursing sweet music; tables, chairs and other articles are moved about the room by invisible hands; iron rings are put on the arm of the medium and on that of other persons in the room; scores of voices are heard at one time; six or eight musical instruments are played in concert. All of these things are taking place while the mediums are tied securely, and where there is no chance for confederates to assist in the performance.

People tell me I am deceived by these mediums, and that all these things are done by trickery. I used to think so once, but when I had a chance to investigate for myself I was obliged to admit that deception was impossible under the circumstances. I, however, do not expect others to believe what I say about it, any more than I believed what others said when I was told about it. All I can say is, others must go and see for themselves as I did. The bible is full of instances where spirits appeared and talked to those with whom they had missions to perform. I am disposed to think that the spirits that appeared in bible times were of a higher grade than those that appear to modern mediums. I judge the spirits, that are materializing now, are of the lower class; and after a time a higher type will appear, and then we shall get communications that will be of more importance to the human family than any we have up to this time. When we get the highest type of spirit communications we shall develop the highest condition of society, and then Shakerism will be much better known and appreciated than it is at the present time. If there are great truths in Christianity, then there are great truths in Shakerism. I believe the Shakers are putting in practice many of the truths that were taught by the early Christians. The community of property, as inculcated by the disciples of Christ, is certainly carried out in practice by the Shakers. The subjugation of the animal, or of the body, to the spirit or mind, was a doctrine of Christians, and I believe it is also of the Shakers.

In my view of things, full three-quarters of the human family ought to be compelled to live celibate lives; for they are not fit to beget children, and ought to be prohibited from doing so. The race should be perpetuated by the other quarter. Is it not about time to stop entailing disease, deformity, vice and crime in this world?

Let Spiritualism and Shakerism join hands and see what they can do for the salvation of the race. But in thus joining they need to incorporate the hygiene and the baptism of fire and water as it is used at the Home of Health.

Yours, for truth,

E. P. Miller.

MATTER AND SPIRIT.

ALL matter, so called, is spirit as much as ice is water. Matter is simply congealed spirit, or solidified ether and gases. Philosophers assure us that heat is everywhere, even in ice, but in a latent state or as a less active principle. Heat or fire is merely the indications of change, which is in degree proportionate to the activity and intensity of the change or combustion. Hence the heat that is required to fuse or melt one metal is compared with that which is required to fuse another.

These somewhat abstruse questions, we are glad to see, are beginning to attract the attention of many spiritualists, and with others that of Col. Olcott, who has lately published a book entitled "People from the Other World." A communication from his pen lately appeared in a Hartford journal upon these subjects, from which we make the following quotations:

"The philosophical chemist uses a balance so delicate that it will render sensible a weight of one-tenthousandth of a grain, and yet no one could see the thing weighed. A metal in common use, not only in the shape of coin, but also in many branches of the mechanic arts—nickle—has recently been detected in the atmosphere, and it need not surprise us if in time every other form of matter on this earth is discovered to exist in sublimation in the air we breathe. Ascience marches apace the secrets of nature will more and more yield themselves to our search. What may be spirit, and what pure matter, where the one ceases and the other begins, I cannot pretend to say, for no man of science has hitherto pushed his experiments that far. If I might hazard a guess upon the basis of the progression of ultimates and the doctrine of evolution, I should suppose the point of juncture would be where pure matter had reached its last degree of sublimation, and spirit—God-descended and God-attracted—stooped downward to that union of which the product is man.

I can say one thing at any rate (and I think I am the only one who can, up to the present moment), I have weighed what we call "spirits," upon a platform scales, as I would a bar of steel, and, moreover, at my request they have caused their weight to vary about forty per cent, in ten minutes. How they do this I do not know, but they made their evanescent bodies, in the first place, by concentrating and making visible and ponderable invisible atoms from the atmosphere by an effort of will, and then, by a further voluntary effort, threw off as much of this matter as was necessary to poise the beam of my scales at the lesser mark of weight."

Certainly, "every form of matter on the earth" exists in a state of sublimation in the atmosphere we breathe. Every mineral substance grows, which has been satisfactorily proved by examining and working old and long deserted mines. The Lake Superior copper mines bear unmistakable evidence of having been worked many thousands of years ago, by an extinct and forgotten race, the mound builders; and where they had evidently well nigh exhausted the ore, the miner now finds copper in abundance; which for unknown ages has been accumulating by growth or aggregation from the surrounding atmospheric elements, where not only copper and nickel exist in sublimation, but gold and silver, as well as all of the sixty odd primitives or basic metals, that float about in a state of sublimation. Gold has been detected in sea water, also.

From this sublimated strata of matter which surrounds this globe and presses everywhere upon it with an inconceivable pressure, the earth is continually aggregating in bulk, and instead of having been made in six days, or in any specified period, it is not yet made, but is yet, as it ever has been since its birth into the great family of worlds, still growing and enlarging and increasing its outward crust. Each successive growth and decay of vegetation is but adding to the bulk of the earth and the fertility of the soil. For vegetation or vegetable matter is not, as is generally inferred, drawn or extracted from the earth. This truth is daily verified by putting earth into pots, boxes, tubs and other vessels, in which flowers, shrubs and even fruit and vegetables are raised, and yet it is evident that the earth never loses a single grain. They who doubt this truth can easily try the experiment by planting a pumpkin seed in a small pot or tub of earth and note the result.

As we observe the ascending scale and progress of animal existence we note the fact that all animal bodies are composed and formed from the surrounding elements or atmosphere, partly from the absorption of vegetable matter taken into the stomach in the form of food, but mainly by direct absorption from the atmosphere just as the vegetable grows. It was not preposterous, therefore, for an ancient inspired writer to say "all flesh is grass."

The body is not the real man or real woman. No one ever sees the real man or real woman, which is the essence or spirit, and it is self-evident always existed, aggregating to itself a body according to the mobility of chemical law and action upon the imponderable elementary substance existing in what is flippantly termed space; and which in time being better understood, or by progress being enabled to act more freely and directly, the spirit will be enabled to materialize and dematerialize a body for the occasion at its will and pleasure from the surrounding elements in sublimation, from whence it is apparent to every reflecting mind all animal bodies are evolved. Viewed in this scientific or natural light, spirit materializations appear no more mysterious or miraculous than the formation of our every-day bodies or other aggregations in nature. In fact it would be a mystery if it could not be done, since the human mind can conceive of no limitation to the power of materialization and dematerialization of matter. Spirit materialization, therefore, becomes a natural and unavoidable sequence in the order of progress on this planet, as well as upon all others; since nature's laws are universal, applicable alike to all worlds and all time.

Kingdom of Heaven.

WATCH.

How very expressive and rich in significance is this little word. It is, verily, a photograph of thought;—a living, breathing picture of actuality, and an indispensable attribute of the Christian, Shaker life. The soul should vigilantly guard its spiritual interests. Watching is its picket guard, its beacon light, its fog bell, giving timely warning of approaching danger.

Chastity of body and purity of spirit—inseparable adjuncts of a Shaker's life, and blessed fruition of the Cross—are obtained only by the strictest watchfulness.

Beautiful, among the fairest and rarest gems in our Father and Mother's Kingdom, will appear the souls of those who are unstained by the sins of a generative life, who conquer passion and every animal proclivity; nobly triumphing over all physical weaknesses. These will be the Flowers of Heaven and the Glory of Paradise.

My dear young friends, to you is the attainment of this hope possible. Watch well your ways, your words, your thoughts, and guard your youthful innocence with the most jealous care. The reward is sure.

Years of deep suffering of soul and floods of repentant tears are not as useful to the spirit as a few hours of watching.

"What I say unto you I say unto all, watch." Never was this injunction more necessary than now. To no class of people was it more applicable. American youth and children can vie with the world in vitiated and abnormal appetites. They are impregnated at birth with an almost insatiable desire for excitement and unnatural stimulants. Parents have, indeed, great need to watch.

The world seems aglow with pleasure, full of sweets and bliss. Glittering charms of the wanton gild a false life; music and poetry in beautiful cadences depict joys never actualized, and the brightest talent of earth's most gifted ones is prostituted to the basest of purposes. How powerful their influence thousands of poor suffering souls can sorrowfully attest. The vile literature which floods the nation is a curse of immense magnitude. The abominable trash is sapping the spiritual life of our young people at an alarming rate. Sound the tocsin of alarm from ocean to ocean, and let us equip for a fierce battle with this monster of iniquity. Let every Christian parent and every lover of virtue unite in a universal and overwhelming protest against this nefarious traffic for lucre. Let us, above all things, keep the plague from our households, and from contact with our darling ones. Watch! ye guardians of the nation's hope, watch!!

Thomas Smith, Canaan, N. Y.

PITTSBURY, 21st February, 1875.

To TIMOTHY RAYSON:

Respected friend—Yours of the 14th inst., was duly received and I offer a few words in reply. I had previously read in the Tribune of your great misfortune and that with feelings very different from what I generally experience in such cases, for though yourself and friend Fraser make the total of my personal acquaintance with Shakers, yet from you I learned that a great many of your distinguishing characteristics are identical with those eccentricities of thought and feeling, which, in a measure, isolate me from my kind, even while living, and necessarily in some degree acting with them, and as "a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind." I read of your misfortune as if I had had a direct personal interest in it, heightened probably by your very recent visit to us.

When a calamity of like nature overtakes the great trading communities as the Chicago and Boston instances, generally in a great measure the result of recklessness and selfish greed, though the suffering may be great even among those not involved in the guilt, yet I am prone to forget the individual losers, and regret mainly that so much of the accumulated results of labor has been swept away which can only be made up by the renewed exertions of the already over-worked toilers of humanity, but when the like happens to a community striving to live on the most just, correct and brotherly principles, though the resulting suffering may not be proportionately so great, yet as it is much less likely to have arisen from carelessness or other preventable cause, the sympathy is also for this reason naturally greater, and though the great multitude of haphazard livers may affect to laugh and even sneer at what they choose to call eccentricities, yet after all, they are fully sensible of your worth as public examples, and, whatever may be said of "total depravity," I think mankind as a whole are more naturally disposed to sympathize and assist in calamity, than to laugh or rejoice at it.

But when the thing has happened what next? One of the most profitable practices of my life has been a careful mental registration of mistakes and shortcomings of whatever nature or kind, always emphasized in proportion to the resulting loss. To remind you of this principle would be indeed "Carrying coal to Newcastle." Nevertheless it is well when we count up what we save from such wrecks, not to forget the value of experience, no inconsiderable item to those who have wisdom to act upon it.

Accept my worthy friend, for yourself personally, and also convey to your community as a whole, the expression of the sincere sympathy of myself and other friends in this place, also my thanks for the two papers you sent me, which I read with great interest. I had also a little pamphlet from friend Fraser, and would like to write to him, but in common with most working men, writing is slow and painful work for me, so be pleased to renew my respects to him when you write.

The weather continues very severe here and water pipes nearly all frozen, and a famine imminent.

Hoping for your friendly visit when you next have occasion to be here,

I am, sincerely yours,
James Law.

THE ADVENTISTS AGAIN DISAPPOINTED.

THE Adventists of Chicago, after making their own interpretation of the Book of Daniel, fixed upon Monday last at midnight for the end of all things here below, and the coming of the Son of Man. They gathered to the number of nearly 200, in their accustomed place of worship, where the day was spent in waiting and suffering annoying visits from unbelievers. At night they sought a secluded hall, where the ceremonies of feet-washing and eating the paschal lamb were observed. With the approach of evening came a thunderstorm, during which the skies were filled with a peculiar yellow light, giving temporary hope and courage to the Adventists on the appearance of the promised sign from heaven. After the fulfillment of their services in the hall, the company knelt, awaiting the coming of midnight and the hour of triumph. The early hour came, but the solemn ticking of the clock continued, and the darkness of night gradually melted into the light of dawn before which the hopes of the self-deluded band vanished. Slowly and sadly they wrapped the mantles of earth about them and stole quietly away; let us hope to learn that "the Kingdom of Heaven cometh not with observation."

In what respect do these consistent Adventists differ from their inconsistent Orthodox Critics? Both read and understand the Scriptures as the very Word of God. All Christendom—Catholic and Protestant—looks for the Second Coming, as do these Adventists. In all respects they are at one, except that the Adventists set the time of the end in their own days—just as the Shakers have done. The latter differ from them all, in the manner, and are living in the fruition of the Kingdom of Heaven.

DUTY.

Remember your duty to God,

Though sorely afflicted you be;
Not through fear of the rod,
Nor yet because danger you see.

Remember your duty to man—

Your Brothers and Sisters on earth;
The surest of ways that you can
Prove your claim to a heavenly birth.

Remember your duty to do,

As well as your duty to know;
Talk may be well—prayer is, too;
But add to them works, and keep low.

The true "faith which worketh by love,"

Has no need for fear of the rod;
Our duty, below or above,
Will lead us in safety to God.

CONTRAST.

In ancient times there was a marked contrast in the practical lives of the Epicurean and Pythagorean philosophers. The former were extreme in devotion to pleasure derived through the medium of external bodily senses. The latter were extremely ascetic, renounced every thing worldly and self-pleasing, devoted their lives and energies to the cultivation of their spiritual faculties, and counted no sacrifice too great, to secure divine favor.

If we bring down the history of those ancient philosophers, and place it side by side with the history of modern philosophers, we find a large class of Epicurean, and very few of the Pythagorean type.

If history speak truly, some who were contemporary with Jesus and the Apostles, were stern in self-discipline, pure in morals, philanthropic in works, and religiously devotional in their feelings.

It is related of Apollonius, an admirer and follower of Pythagoras, that to prove himself worthy to be called a self-conqueror, he subsisted entirely on fruit and vegetables, drank water only, would not marry, and took a vow of silence which he preserved unbroken five years, during which time he accumulated a large amount of spiritual wisdom and power; not only learned how to command and govern his own spirit, but to exert a controlling influence over others in the same direction. While he was affectionate and gentle in his manner, judicious in his counsels, he was powerful in reproving sin and vanity, which he never failed to do when opportunity offered. His power consisted in having conquered those things in himself. How much we stand in need of such philosophers in our own time, who will both practice and teach.

The doctrine of the trinity, vicarious suffering and atonement, that was decided by the learned Bishops of the council of Nice in the fourth century (who happened to be more powerful than their opponents), lifted the weight of responsibility from the professed followers of Jesus, and Christianity (so called) has grown more theoretical and less practical, until the present time.

If the philosophers of the nineteenth century, instead of spending their energies in admiring Jesus and lauding him with praises in word and song, while in practice they deny his teaching and put him to open shame, would bring their wisdom and knowledge to bear upon all the transactions of daily life, in public and private, would they not by so doing exalt their own characters and help to elevate others? Jesus exalted himself by the practice of virtue, laying down the natural life and taking the higher spiritual life. In that way he was "lifted up" and became an example to others.

Some of the oriental polytechnic students, who were familiar with the history of Jesus, said "Some great and good Spirit descended upon him at his baptism, and united with his soul. Thus he became Jesus the Anointed, or Jesus Christ." By co-operating with that good Spirit he was "lifted up," and drew others unto him, and helped them to be better and purer in morals and more spiritual in their aspirations.

We need the kind of philosophy to-day that will result in chastened thought and purified imagination; a philosophy that will lift the soul above morbid sensibilities, selfish loves and affections and sensual deeds, make us Christ-like, and cause us to feel the power of the "new commandment" which he gave to his disciples when he walked with them in mortal form, "Love one another as I have loved you."

Then Science and Religion, bound together by indissoluble ties, will march hand in hand and keep step with the music of the higher spheres. Thus a "new earth" will be formed, wherein the righteousness which belongs to that Order, in a rectified condition, will dwell; and it will be tributary to the new heavenly Order, which will be as a garner to receive the ripened grain of the earth—those souls who have progressed beyond the natural, generative order—the seed plane—and are ready for the visitation of the harvesting angel with the sharp sickle, to reap them from that field and gather them into higher, broader fields, to work for and with the angels, in replenishing the heavens with resurrected souls.

It occurs to us that many of the philosophers and learned divines of our own time might study the ancient Vedas with profit to themselves and for the benefit of the people whom they profess to guide and teach, if they would make practical application of many truths therein contained. All nations have had their standard of faith and morals; and when we lay aside traditional education and prejudice, we shall be willing to look fairly at every thing within our grasp or vision, and as far as we are able, accept the true and reject the false. The Veda asks "Of what use is it to seek corporeal pleasures? The inhabitants of the body are cupidity, anger, desire for wealth, envy, sadness, disappointment, hunger, thirst, disease, old age and death. Of what use then to seek pleasures through the body?"

"Through strict veracity, uniform control of mind and senses, abstinence from sexual indulgence, man should approach God, who, full of glory and perfection, works in the heart, and to whom only votaries, freed from passion and sensual desire, can approximate. God is the final refuge of all who are firm in virtue, who do not destroy their own purity. There is nothing desirable but the Science of God. To be attached to material things is to be chained. To be without such attachment is to be free!"

Who will say that the above scripture, if considered and practically applied, would not benefit the people of the nineteenth century? Do we hear voices saying "Look unto Jesus as the author and finisher of faith?" Then we reply "Faith without works is dead." Jesus, for the joy that was set before him, endured—took up—the cross and despised the shame." Let us do likewise.

VENTILATION.

I AM so pleased to find a paragraph in the (January number of the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS, dated 1875,) treating upon ventilation, that I am quite solicitous that the writer continue the subject, until its importance is fully realized, by those to whom it is addressed.

The paragraph to which I refer, embraced fifteen lines only. In my view, fifteen columns in favor of proper ventilation, would hardly be too many to be devoted to this subject, (provided each of these could be rationally studied,) to combat, or arouse the giant of public indifference, in this respect.

Should there not be some further means used to disseminate this phase of gospel truth, and some more efficient methods taken to help the public to rightly estimate the amount of physical suffering induced by breathing impure air?

Without any doubt nine-tenths of the colds experienced in these northern United States, with their train of unaccounted ills, owe their origin to non-vitalized air.

Dr. Jarvis, in his Practical Philosophy, tells us, that we spoil for all purposes of inspiration, about four cubic feet of air per minute; and also, that seven feet is necessary for the maintenance of healthy inspiration!

How long then, we shall be content, (in the face of Science,) to subsist daily upon an atmosphere laden with poison; or, how long we shall be willing to "die daily," for want of breath, are questions to which I find no solutions given in any of the Scientific Reasons why, extant; I, therefore, trust that you will pardon me for referring them to you.

By using the word subsist, I mean what an eminent British writer once suggested, when he stated that "man subsists on air more than upon his meat and drink." This may not be literally true in all cases, but if we inhale a pint of air at a time, a hundred thousand times in every twenty-four hours, we must receive into the lungs every day about fifty hogsheads of this fluid, which should be considered a generous "bill of fare" at least.

Dr. Griscom, also, enjoins upon us to return thanks to God for the air we inhale, eighteen times a minute, as well as for the food we eat three times a day, since without the former, the latter would be useless.

Philosophy assures us it is estimated, that there is an ocean of air forty-five miles in height continually encircling our earth. This fact alone, proves to me that air was intended for the most liberal use. Anatomy, again, presents the fact that the healthy human lungs are capable of holding a gallon of air, especially, when the six hundred millions of air-cells which they contain are fully inflated, and further proves that pure atmospheric air is not only one of the greatest blessings ever bestowed upon physical life, but that the Divine Master-Builder created ample reservoirs for its reception.

This array of facts may be more interesting to me, than to my friends; for, having given some attention to singing as a mode of worship and a vocal exercise, both in public and private, and having so often realized the necessity of breathing pure air, I am prepared to state that of all the inconveniences inflicted upon professional singers and speakers in public, none equals the exclusion, or the non-admission of pure air, when engaged in these efforts.

I look upon it as a species of torture which a system of civilization that builds air-tight school-houses and churches is willing to tolerate, and of which the savage tribes are innocent.

According to Dr. Charles A. Guilmette's Vocal Theory, "Voice is breath made vocal, and pure tone the essential element of all music."

Does it not follow, therefore, that the vocalist is unable to manufacture pure tones out of impure air?

We, who profess to be true Shakers, strongly advocate, purity of thought, of heart and life, believing that from purity alone proceeds that "Cleanliness which is next to Godliness." In view of this profession, therefore, ought we not to strive to maintain as much as is practicable, an atmosphere comparatively pure, in every apartment, and especially in our public halls dedicated to divine worship? An atmosphere out of which pure thoughts are molded and holy aspirations rise.

It is my belief that the mind and body are so intimately connected that the former is very sensibly affected, oftentimes, by the condition of the latter, and that the mind, fettered by physical suffering, rarely acts up to its highest conceptions of Godliness. From this

I infer, that no physiologically enlightened mind, can worship God in an illy ventilated Church, with that singleness of heart, and freedom from earthliness, that he ought.

In conclusion, let me add, that, perchance I may have expressed some views which do not exactly accord with those of a higher religious experience, yet what I have stated is a part of God's truth, to my understanding.

I have so long meditated upon this subject, and found so much more real satisfaction in studying the Laws of Ventilation, and the Art of Breathing, than I could possibly realize, in studying the Laws which pertain to Generation and its belongings, that I have often heartily wished that some of the able writers and speakers of the "Present Age," would treat the former subject with as much fairness and liberality as the latter has been treated, during the last forty years.

Would they do thus, I venture to predict that one-half the "ills that flesh is heir to," would speedily fall in disrepute. And if Physiology, as a study, could be placed within reach of every pupil in the land, instead of insipid novels, and the Laws of Hygiene practically enforced by parents and teachers, not only health of body would be secured, but that rare mental quality Common Sense would everywhere prevail.

Anson C. Stickney, Shaker Village, N. H.

DAWN OF A NEW ERA.

MATERIALIZATION is among the beautiful and important wonders of our day. But what is it, and how produced? As yet there is no definite answer to these questions. The vague theory, that spirits draw material from the mediums and circle, out of which to fashion tangible bodies, clothing, etc., must be proven before it is accepted; mere belief is not knowledge, and skepticism is not investigation.

The doubting mind of Washington Irving's Governor Vantwiler, could not see through the clouds of tobacco smoke, the railway upon the land, nor the telegraph beneath the ocean, yet the achievements of science were still advancing toward these culminations; and though skeptics have been wrapped in the smoke of their egotism, spiritualism has steadily advanced to its present point of importance.

Before the inventor Morse ticked messages from city to city, from continent to continent, communication was opened, upon a similar plan, by dwellers in the Spirit World, with dwellers in this.

If you give a magnet nothing to do, it will lose its power; and so with the organs of the head. Cramped reason, flagrant combativeness, and a weak, ghostly ideality, made up the Trinity of Protestantism, by which Spirituality was branded, and sent into the society of marvelousness, to find her abode with the simple and ignorant.

This was the last act of the old monarchical Church and State. But in the new Republic—the system of School and State—the scars and distortions of ages are measurably outlived; and now the inhabitants of the earth may learn righteousness; for the lightnings lighten the world.

We must not ignore nor transgress the laws that govern materialization, any more than we would ignore or violate those which temper the sun's rays. The most familiar things with which we are acquainted are dependent on conditions. One person may see with the naked eye distant and small objects, while another can only enjoy that degree of vision through the aid of glasses. From the lonely ship voices can be heard for miles over the tranquil star-lit waters, while amid the roar of the tempest, or the density of the fog, they are inaudible, or husky, even on her own deck.

If the high winds of human contentions and the simooms of sandy or earthly individuality, are likely to extinguish the beams that are just breaking upon us, it is needful—for a time at least—that they should be shaded by a cabinet, and that the contending minds be harmonized by even such "music as charms the savage." We differ as one star differs from another; but we each have a place. Like the metals in the mine, we differ; some of us resemble the lead-stone, while others are similar to the iron which is capable of being suffused with its magnetic power.

We need to patiently learn the lessons of life eternal. Astronomy tells us that a common-sized man, removed to the surface of the sun, would weigh between two and three tons; because a bulk weighing here one pound would there weigh nearly thirty pounds, so great is the sun's power of gravitation. May not a spirit that weighs here fifty or eighty pounds have in its own home a weight appropriate to its dimensions?

We readily avail ourselves of the dark telescope and microscope, when we seek knowledge of the vast and minute works of the Creation; but we do not imagine that the darkness has materialized the stars—that the sunlight can extinguish them—or that the animalcula draw their existence from the glass which reveals them any more than we think that the friends and furniture in our room are composed of particles emitted from the lamp which brings them to view.

What we call materialization is, perhaps, only the result of conditions, which combined, present to us the "bodies celestial," and make visible the unseen. Our intellectual faculties are enhanced by natural science; but where is the science of the soul? The morning stars may continually sing together, and the whole Universe pour its grandly varying oratorio into the ear of God; but we are deaf; the shining vault holds for us only silent stars, and the bright sunlight only an empty void. Through the atmosphere of our earth, we perceive sights and sounds, and may not the atmosphere of a clairvoyant, or a number of clairvoyants, become so strengthened, and expanded, as to vivify the spiritual beings around us, and to reverberate the music of the spheres?

Cecilia Deyr, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

FUNERALS AND FLOWERS.

ONE impressive feature of the Shaker reformatory system is the mode of conducting funeral ceremonies.

In times of extravagance and folly, it is refreshing to find one nook in the World, reserved for those who prefer unostentatious ways of journeying through life.

Believer's faith—growing into knowledge of the translation of the living entity of mortals, to a Spiritual state of existence, losing no mental qualification gained by Earth experience—gives a freedom of thought and action between those just departing therefrom, and those performing the last acts of kindness in smoothing the passage to their prospective home. There is neither the reward of Heaven, nor the punishment of Hell to distort or torture their minds by uncertainty concerning God's rewards or penalties; but a clear consciousness of one's own right or wrong doing, day by day, causing the spirit to render its own verdict of happiness or misery.

As life's burdens are borne with a reference to the Soul being moulded by its present surroundings, every incentive is given to a true Believer to enable the living acting part to progress—to travel from ignorance to knowledge; and to become enlightened according to its desires.

In the outside World, circumstances often tend to demoralizing ways and fashions; or to lose cast in society, which few have the moral stamina to meet.

In united body, a few determined souls have passed beyond the bounds of popularity and worldly reputation, especially in regard to interring the dead. They practically discard all display of silver mounted coffins, conveyed in an elaborately finished hearse, ornamented with white or sable plumes, denoting age and wealth of the poor perishing remains. Nor do habiliments of grief, of latest style, have to be procured by a rational Shaker, knowing that the spirit needs no mockery of sorrow at its departure. Sincere affection will not resort to external trappings as a manifestation of sorrow.

In plain coffin, the lifeless form, clad in fitting garment, simply fashioned as when worn in every-day life, rests its head as peacefully, as if clothed in the finest fabric, with kid gloves, and costly slippers, merely to feed the pride of the living. At a plain Shaker funeral, we see no display of ministerial oratory to eulogize the dead. Gospel brethren and sisters—true hearted friends—give expression to feelings of love and affection, as they well up in their hearts, speaking of the good deeds and worthy examples of the deceased brother, or sister, as they have mingled in familiar intercourse in home duties and pleasures, also of their travel and toils together, in the spirit of work of redemption.

The foregoing simple exercises, together with the hymns and sacred songs, on such occasions, mostly known by the departed one, can but buoy up the freed spirit to continue in good works, and become more and more worthy of the endearing remembrances of kindred friends on earth, strengthened by the laws of attraction to return, and reveal the knowledge of spirit power, to help the weary and faint-hearted to more exalted attainments; while they continue to progress in the life beyond, and by an increase in truth, overcome all errors committed while in this rudimentary life.

While I am an admirer of the plain and unpretending manner in which obsequies are performed by Believers, I would like to advance an idea, which to me seems rational. I am young in the faith, and have not had an opportunity of getting very deeply baptized into the spiritual work; I cannot understand how the introduction of flowers, at Believers' funerals, would detract from the simplicity of their burial rites. Flowers are the loveliest specimens of Nature's works; and it seems to me that at such seasons they might be used to profit. They are sweet emblems—given for man's spiritual culture—and it is well ever to have an eye to the beautiful and good, in all the relations of life. Those gems of Earth's production, surround the soul with refined atmosphere, guiding the mind into higher channels of thought; even as harmonious strains of music subdue the ravings of a disordered brain.

Annie Dwyer, South Union, Ky.

REMARKS.

Allow me to suggest to my new sister Annie, who has quite recently been gathered from the broad expansive plane, where pleasure seeking, in outward external things, is the chief desire and aim, that if the flowers of Earth are beautiful, fragrant and refining, are not heavenly flowers more so? Would it not be a desirable and beautiful attainment, to become so thoroughly spiritual and inspirational, by holy living, that all the senses be sanctified, and we enabled to see Angels, hear them sing, walk with them in the celestial gardens and cull the flowers which never fade? If we become thus ethereal, when our Gospel friends pass on before us to their home in the spirit spheres, we will be so closely allied to them that there will be a harmonious blending of spirit with spirit; and natural material things, pertaining to earth life, however good and true in their proper place, would not enhance the pleasure and worth of soul communings. The glory of the terrestrial is one thing, and the glory of the celestial another. Ed.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

How good and pleasant it is, when the toils of the day are over, to feel that we have striven, to the best of our ability, by faithful performance of every duty, to honor and glorify God and benefit humanity. Then no bitter reflections follow on account of misspent time. No harsh or unkind words suffered to escape our lips, will rise up to reproach—to sting the conscience and bring remorse. The evening of a well-spent day is calm, the meditation serene and the repose peaceful and unbroken.

When, on bended knees, we give thanks to God for blessings received, we can also with confidence ask a continuance of the same through the medium of angel guides, for obedience to Christian principles brings souls into harmony and communion with angelic beings. Through their ministrations we receive strength, are inspired with holy thoughts and feelings, our hearts are filled with sweet melody, and we are led to sing

" 'Tis joy to walk in Wisdom's way,
Her laws and precepts to obey."

When thus exercised, worldly pleasures seem valueless, effete, and lose their hold upon the affections. However severe the trials and sorrows of life, as we sail upon its stormy sea, our Heavenly Parents will guide the Bark, order all things right, and bear us safely over the billowy deep to the voyager's blissful home of rest in that haven where the raging winds of passion never blow, where we can drink to fullness of Christian love, of which we have a foretaste here.

True Believers in Christ exemplify their faith by works, and let their light shine brighter and brighter as they practically grow into the true, leaving all that is false. Such constitute a Living Body. If we become members of that Body, our conceptions of God — of Truth — will expand, grow broader and deeper. The divine life will become our element in which we live, move and have our being. All darkness will flee before us, and suffering, the product of sin and wrong doing, with us will cease. Then like Jesus, our elder Brother, we can say "The prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in me." Like him, we shall overcome the world, and like him, "triumph over death and the grave." "The sting of death is sin." The grave over which we need to gain the victory is the love of the world in our own hearts.

The human heart is the receptacle of evil thoughts and desires, which, if unrestrained and unsubdued, swallow up and entomb all the nobler faculties of the mind and hold the soul within its walls, which was justly described in olden times as the "chambers of death." From this sepulchre of sin and sensual pleasure, the desires, affections and powers of the human soul need to be emancipated, resurrected, by coming into Christ, receiving his baptism. Then, like him, we shall triumph in victory, and appear in the glory that fadeth not away.

Joanna Randall, Shirley, Mass.

BELOVED ELDERESS ANTOINETTE:

Having enjoyed the luxury of feasting on the savory contents of the excellent paper, SHAKER AND SHAKERESS, I think it but just to try to render something to add to its columns.

I have been much edified in perusing the soul utterances of my dear Gospel Brothers and Sisters who have thoughtfully contributed to the union feast, and would express thanks to every one for the same.

I was specially interested in reading the beautiful production from the pen of that consecrated "Mother in Israel," Eunice Bathrick, in the May number. Such breathings diffuse spiritual life and true soul inspirations which must do good, having been produced from long experience in the blessed higher life. May we aim to copy her living example, and heed her wise exhortation to "Zion's daughters," thus preserving the unity of the spirit, and be able to do good and help others less favored.

Abundant thanks to the managers of the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS for your evident pains-taking to gather and prepare wholesome food, not only for the immediate guests who have been called in to sit with you at the table in a spiritual order, but for the multitudes as well — those who are still on the earth plane. May you be blessed and strengthened in your arduous duties and many burdens in the labor of enlightening souls, and opening to their understanding the distinction of the spheres, earthly and heavenly, and how to attain unto the latter, is the sincere and earnest desire of your sister.

Marcia E. Hastings, Canterbury, N. H.

A PASSAGE in the Turkish Scriptures reads as follows: "Take care that your final accounts shall be settled before you die. Undergo here your indictment and your trial. Pass on yourself just sentence and punishment. Then will you pass into the future without further chastisement or fear."

BEAUTIFUL DAY.

—O—

Night's silvery stars melt in morning's soft blushes,
Her dark spectral shadows glide noiseless away,
While nature, enwrapped in her deep silent hushes,
Awakes to the call of the beautiful day.

The light-hearted songsters mount upward in gladness,
And trill their sweet music all blithesome and gay.
What heart could respond with a feeling of sadness?
For joy crowns the beautiful, beautiful day!

The sun glids the crest of the forest-clad mountain,
And brightens the vale where the early mist lay,
From woodland and meadow, from streamlet and fountain,
Come voices of welcome to beautiful day!

From flowers, the honey-dew fragrance ascending
Is wafted along by the breezes at play;
Creations of beauty around us are blending
In praise of the glory of beautiful day!

We gratefully share of life's bounties external,
Which come like a day-dream, nor yet come to stay;
But still look beyond to that region supernal,
Where beameth forever a beautiful day!

The forms we are wearing, the scenes we're beholding,
Are subject to change and the blight of decay;
But germs of the spirit, God's light is unfolding,
To bloom in eternity's beautiful day.

Martha J. Anderson, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

LOVE.—There is great power in love. Addressing his disciples, Jesus said, "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you; continue ye in my love." He was moved by this spirit of love when he said, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." He overcame the world in himself by energy of spirit; he wrestled against the temptations which were presented to him, and contended with principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places; and by love to God, to truth and to humanity, he conquered the powers of darkness, and left an example that we all can safely follow.

He was not content merely to love those who loved and honored him; but he learned to "love his enemies, to bless those who hated and persecuted him, and to pray for those who spitefully used him." So strong was his love to righteousness that he laid down his life in its defense; and all who find a true joining to Christ as the Head of the Church, must live as he lived, bear the same cross of self-denial, rise into the divine life and become one with him, as he became one with the Eternal Parents.

Then, we shall so dwell in love that our offerings Godward will all be made in love. In love we shall serve and pray for one another and for all souls. Through love we shall intercede for the lost and erring, that God would send mediums to open the eyes of the spiritually blind, that they may behold the light of the truth, that the deaf may hear the sound of the everlasting Gospel, and be guided in paths of holiness and peace.

Rachel Sampson, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

SPIRITUALITY.—The Apostle Paul said: "To be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." Those words are as true to-day as when spoken. So far as the mind expands to receive wisdom and knowledge from the Divine Source, so far does the soul incline to heavenly things, to drink of living waters, and to receive the treasures of immortality.

Life, light and love abide with the spiritually minded. In true consecration there is peace which the world cannot give. Earthly things, however beautiful they may appear to the outward senses, perish with the using, and pass away. Heavenly things abide forever.

THE sick squaw of a dusky chief in Washington Territory lately told her noble husband that she didn't think that she should ever feel any better unless he killed her doctor. This is a novel and startling view of medical matters, and interesting to the profession. The doctor was duly killed; and upon being tried for his murder, the chief was acquitted on the ground that he acted in defense of his wife's life! The doctors in those regions must feel a little doubtful about continuing in the business under such circumstances.

DIVINE EARNESTNESS.

—O—

THE Apostle Paul, in his stirring letter to the Philippians, said "This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forth unto those things which are before." The soon succeeding words "Brethren, be followers together of me," would imply that the strongest wish of this devoted servant of Christ was to have those who had been attracted to the truth by the inspiring zeal of his testimonies awake to their highest duty.

To forget all things that ought to be forgotten. Their sins and errors had been confessed and repented of, as their first step in discipleship. There were many things in their past lives which it were better never to have learned, but which now must be forgotten; for all things were to become "new." Having thus dropped all needless incumbrances, what was the next duty? "Reaching forth" unto the better, higher and more spiritual; "press toward the mark," etc.

As runners for an earthly prize lay aside every weight and impediment, so must the winner of the heavenly state become inspired with a holy enthusiasm and a living earnestness to win the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, or become like Him.

Viewed outwardly, there was little or no success in his life; but what a glorious result was that when he could say "I have overcome the world." When that natural organism through which he was manifested had become so pure a receptacle that Satan could find nothing in it; that the pure unselfish doctrines which he taught had found their exponent in his life.

Certainly that life is most a benefaction which is most fruitful in good works, and has done the most to lighten the burden of misery which weighs so heavily on earth's groaning children. As a poet has so beautifully expressed:

"They whose great souls were great beyond compare,

They whose high Prophet brows did ever shine,
They who made earth most beautiful and fair,
Drank not while here of pleasure's purple wine;
But were content the cross and scorn to bear,
Enduring all things in a calm sublime;
And He who did the weightiest sorrow wear,
With noblest heart bloomed into the divine.
Then let us never murmur nor complain
When the night darkens and the icy rain
Of wrong and hatred beats around our way,
But joy that we "are counted worthy," say
With blessed martyrs toil to undergo
The hero labors, while the children play."

Not, we presume, that there should be no play, but that our souls should glow with so divine an earnestness that play would be impossible when the needs around required work, and that would speak its silent voice of reproof to our souls if we would allow ourselves to shirk the burdens of life.

If a soul should become wrecked on the dark strands of despair through our indifference, will not some accusing angel of mercy lower us into some hell of condemnation long enough to convince us that "inasmuch as we have done, or not done, it to one of the least, we have done, or not done, it to Him?" Nothing but the daily justice and purity of our lives can make us winners of that richest prize, a sweet, subdued and self-sacrificing love for God, manifested in our love for each other, until the human temple from which this light streams forth becomes beautiful and glorious, even though it be worn with the furrows of age, or otherwise "marred in the hands of the potter."

E. Webster, Harvard, Mass.

SCANDAL.—A woman confessed to a priest that she was guilty of circulating a scandal. He gave her a ripe thistle top, and told her to scatter the seeds, one by one, in every direction. She obeyed, and returned after her task was done. He then ordered her to go back and collect the scattered seed. She said it would be impossible. He replied it would be more impossible to gather up and destroy all the evil reports that she had circulated about others.

Blessed are they who walk uprightly and speak truth in their hearts. That back-bite not with their tongues, nor take up a reproach against their neighbors.

DISPENSATIONS.

Brightly a star over Bethlehem beamed,
 That shepherds and wise men discerned,
 And followed with gladness, 'till over a child
 Its glory effulgently burned.
 Born of the highest unfoldment of law,
 Prophecies grand in his life to fulfill,
 From faith and obedience the power to draw,
 To be the earth's Saviour through God's holy will.
 When the meek heart sought the Jordan baptism.
 Where was an outpouring of heavenly love,
 The spirit of Christ to Jesus was given —
 The pure, holy spirit, in the form of a dove.
 Now was commencing a New Dispensation,
 The Father revealed in the Son,
 A High Priest who show'd a lost world salvation,
 And taught how its prize must be won.
 He lik'd the kingdom of God to the mustard,
 The smallest among the small seeds,
 And showed how the increase of life would expand it
 To come to humanity's needs.
 He likened it also unto the leaven
 A woman concealed in three measures of meal.
 The laws Patriarchal, previously given,
 The power of the New Dispensation must feel.
 He taught on the mountain without peradventure
 To pray for the kingdom of God among men;
 He taught that they never that kingdom could enter
 Until of the Spirit they were born again.
 He gave them the cross as a means of salvation,
 For those who would rise from the first Adam's fall,
 And whose would follow in regeneration,
 Must hate their own life and relinquish their all.
 He noticed the gift of the widow's last farthing —
 'Twas all, in her penury, that she possessed;
 But more in His eyes than the rich man's great offering —

It showed her heart's effort to bless and be blessed.
 The Pharisees temptingly brought Him a woman,
 And cited the law that was given of yore;
 He put them to shame by the power above human,
 Then pardoned and bade her to go sin no more.
 Wisely He spoke to Samaria's afflicted,
 All irrespective of cast or degree;
 And many she called, for her soul was convicted
 That He was the Christ whom they wanted to see.
 When one much afflicted took hold of His garment,
 With faith, that through sorrow, had gained its control,
 He said to her, "Daughter, my peace I give to thee,
 The strength of thy faith hath indeed made thee whole."
 He came to the sick and dispelled their diseases;
 In mercy the leper and lunatic healed;
 Gave sight to the blind, and voice to the speechless,
 And called back to life some whom death's hand had sealed.
 Among His disciples there was not a woman,
 Though Mary and Martha His gospel He taught;
 And many with reverence ministered to Him,
 And gifts from their substance most lovingly brought.
 The Spirit of Truth was the Comforter promised
 Unto the disciples, who could not yet bear
 The many deep things which he needed to tell them,
 That they for the kingdom might truly prepare.
 But when on Mount Calvary, painfully dying,
 He said to His mother, "Behold now thy son!"
 And to His disciples, "Behold thou thy mother!"
 Then was His life-mission finished and done!
 Thus was the woman oft blest by the Saviour,
 Though humble and low was her place;
 He knew that with man she would yet be anointed
 To work for the Order of Grace.
 The woman must be in the fourth Dispensation:

The gospel of Christ is for all;
 Her name must be raised from the old accusation
 Of being the cause of the fall.
 On woman the spirit of God has descended,
 And Mother in Daughter revealed;
 On the right hand she stands, in wrought gold of Ophir,
 Her heaven is no more concealed.
 The Bride and the Bridegroom that long were expected,
 Achieved the true Order of Grace;
 A Father and Mother, in the New Creation,
 Have brought forth a heaven-born race.
 The kingdom has come which the ancients long prayed for —
 The empire of Daughter and Son;
 And souls born again heaven's fullness inherit —
 The Lord's will on earth is now done.
 The Lord is beginning to shake every nation;
 Salvation the woman has won;
 In purity now she in Zion is dwelling,
 Where righteousness shines like the sun.
 The truth is established, in glory and beauty,
 And yet for an increase 'tis rife;
 The voice of the Spirit and Bride are proclaiming,
 Ho! come to the waters of life.

JEWISH HISTORY.

—O—

"In Christ are hid all the treasures of Wisdom and Knowledge."

THESE things were written for the admonition of us, upon whom the ends of the world have come.

The history of external Israel is as a shadow or chart of the history of the New Creation, or Spiritual Israel.

The first class of Israelites, born in Egypt, carried with them Egyptian proclivities—old habits, appetites and passions, inherited and acquired. By the marvelously wonderful Spiritual phenomena witnessed in Egypt, through the mediumship of Moses and Aaron, those proclivities were suspended, and afterward held in check by continued exhibitions of Divine power, throughout the forty years travel in the Wilderness.

The cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, went before them, from their passage of the Red Sea, to their passage, dry shod, over Jordan. In both instances the waters stood in heaps, ready to overflow them the moment the power was withdrawn; that first appeared to Moses in the burning bush, that was not burned; in a stick that became a serpent, but was not a serpent, that swallowed other serpents that were nothing but sticks in the hands of the Egyptian Media.

The ten plagues were Spiritual phenomena. The two spheres touched each other and interblended. As were the Egyptian Media, so were Moses and Aaron, with this important difference: Higher and purer Spiritual Beings—Gods—inspired Moses and Aaron, than were those inspiring the Egyptian Magi. They had objects to accomplish—plans to carry out—in relation to Israel, as a nation, and through Israel, as a medium, in relation to the whole race of man upon earth.

Time was an element in their programme; and Numbers were used by the succeeding Prophets of Israel as evidence of the existence of such general plan, or design, framed by some thinking, calculating, intelligent being, or beings.

The whole Jewish and Christian world acknowledge this element of time, however much they differ about the day and hour, or the manner of accomplishing the promises, and of fulfilling the prophecies.

The first class of Israelites, who came out of Egypt, all died in the Wilderness, except two, Joshua and Caleb. These received the revelation of the Second Coming Degree of the Jewish System, and they led the generation, born in the Wilderness, into the Land of Promise.

The Spirit—God of Israel—had two visions of that first class. One was, that they were a chosen and peculiar people—Saints of the Most High—a Royal Priesthood to all coming generations of the Jews. The other, that they were a rebellious, murmuring, unbelieving, stiff-necked, wicked generation, with whom God was not well pleased. And this, from the day that Moses and Aaron knew them, until Joshua and Caleb finished burying their carcasses, in the Wilderness, that had fallen according to the curse pronounced upon them by their God, whom they had wearied by their importunities, and grieved by their everlasting back-sliding toward the Egypt from which they were only externally delivered. Their old habits and propensities were like the Leopard's spots. Yet, what a change they underwent in their diet and manner of life! It was from one great extreme to another. In Egypt, their labor was excessive, and their food, its flesh-pots. Now, their food is Manna—light food—that their souls loathed, and drink corresponding—pure water—nothing more.

The change that awaited them, when over Jordan, was equally unexpected and trying to their Spiritual Faith and physical systems. Instead of the land in common, their food in common, and their clothing unwearoutable, and shoes that would not wax old, the Manna ceased to fall, the shoes and garments did wax old, and henceforth, if they did not work, neither could they eat. To this end, in Canaan, the land was divided, to each a portion, and only by industry and economy, could they eat the fat thereof.

Two orders of people were founded—the generating Jews, and the Essenes, who held their land in common, did not marry, would not fight, and ate no flesh of animals, clean or unclean. The product of this order was the Son of Man—Jesus—the ultimate fruit of the Essene tree. He became the cornerstone of the first temple—the Primitive Church—of which the Temple of Solomon was a type.

The other order—the generating Jews—progressed on, down the ages, until incorporated in the Roman Empire. Church and State were then combined, like Adam and Eve, when first created—the Spiritual and temporal—generation and regeneration—the whole race evolving toward the second appearing of the Christ-Spirit, when the mystery of God would be finished by the final separation of Church and State, and the founding of a true order of generation, having a civil government, free from theology, based upon the first principles of the Mosaic law of holiness in earthly things—the rulers, male and female—the land, held for all to work and live from—their diet, the fruit of the soil, free from blood-shed—the relation of the sexes, free from the unfruitful works of darkness.

Thus are the two orders now started. The United States, and the United Societies. The Spiritual will ultimately separate from the natural, and the natural will be entirely separated from the Church, in the United States government.

The First Degree of Seven, was a Wilderness state. That first generation are nearly all gone. A few of them, like Joshua, have the revelation of the New, or Second Degree.

The Canaanites, to be driven out, are the anti-christian sects, who have monopolized the land, which must yet be divided unto the people of the country. They have raised fat hogs, rather than fine men and women. They live upon the lives of other creatures. In their generating—their sexual relations—they are lower than the animals they slaughter for food, and who, in turn, slaughter them, by diseases that they generate in their physical bodies.

Eternal warfare, with Amalekites, was the law of Israel, external. And eternal hatred of the carnal mind, with all its lusts of the flesh and spirit, is the privilege and duty of members of this Zion of God. It is their right to be in continual communion with the saints and prophets of all ages and races—to be baptized with the Christ of God—the Rock of Ages, which always responds when struck by the wand of truth, sending forth the living faith of the redeemed, in the Heavens, to the struggling saints on earth.

Better to be in communion with the true actors of the scenes of the past, now in the Spirit World, than to depend entirely upon the history that imperfectly describes those scenes.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD.

—O—

As members of the great family of man, we have one common ancestry, are imperfect and have need of boundless charity, and of improvement in every righteous direction. Wherein, then, do members of the true Church of Christ differ from the unchristianized citizens of the world? Just here—The former, having been baptized with the Christ-Spirit, have had their intuitions quickened and inspired and possess a consciousness of a divine call to higher, purer and more spiritual condition, and to the necessity of attaining it by every facility vouchsafed to them through the power of God. They are fortunate in having the invitation before others perhaps equally worthy. There is, therefore, no reason why such should arrogate, to themselves, superiority over others not thus favored, except by obeying their superior calling and conforming to a higher standard of righteousness.

The followers of Christ are commanded to be separate from the world. This enjoining does not refer to external habitations only. Some may have availed themselves of this external isolation for sordid purposes, continued in iniquity, and been a curse to themselves and to society.

All members of Christ's Church are under sacred obligation to a life of righteousness, purity and charity, surpassing those who are not favored with like facilities. This is an interior work—a discipline which church members must keep in vital activity in all places and under all circumstances.

Souls are not worthy of the name of Christians—Shakers—unless they live such life all the time and everywhere.

Although I incessantly and earnestly bear the Cross of Christ, and thank God for the great salvation from sin that I enjoy, I do not thank him in the sense of a pharisaical righteousness that I am not as outside publicans. On close examination I find I have not yet attained that high standard of purity and righteousness—that redemption of soul from the nature of sin—which the spirit of progression is continually pointing me to.

Professed members of Christ's Church, who feed their sensual appetites and passions with narcotics—opium, tobacco in any form, beer, wine, cider, any stimulating or stupefying beverages—should not arrogate, to themselves, great perfection of separation from the world.

It is precisely on this physiological platform of self-denial that the Church of Christ, as an institution of progression, should cease to blend with the world. To mingle with outside society for the purpose of ministering the Christian testimony, or to transact necessary business, may be consistent with that separation from the world which characterizes the true Church of Christ. Neither Jesus nor Ann was afraid thus to mingle with the publicans, sinners and magdalens of their day, and break to them the bread of life.

A soul, who lives in purity and charity, and moves in obedience to his or her spiritual directors, cannot be injured by the society of the world. Such are able to minister virtue and avoid contamination.

There is suffering in the Church of Christ for want of laborers to disseminate its principles in the field of human society. For still the harvest is truly great, and the laborers are few. Should they not, even now, be passing and reaping over the great harvest field of the world, reaping where angel hands have sown?

THE SHAKER AND SHAKERESS is doing what it can, and is evidently instant in season in its efforts to reach the popular heart and conscience. Let us not cease to pray the Lord of the harvest field to send forth more laborers.

PUBLIC MATERIALIZATION.

—O—

MOUNT LEBANON, June 15, 1875.

HORATIO EDDY & Co.—Esteemed Friends:

I have been impressed that the time has arrived when Spiritualism should begin to do to Humanity the good designed by the Powers Above.

Materialization is the second step in Spiritualism—the second Degree. There will be seven Degrees.

A public meeting, in some great city, where the speakers—part of them—were materialized, would begin a Religious Revival as much exceeding that got up by Moody and Sankey, in England, as Truth exceeds Error, or substance its shadow.

Will you co-operate with me to bring this about? If so, on what terms, and under what conditions?

Please confer together, and, if at all disposed to entertain my proposition, consult the Ruling Spirits.

As educational preparation for the great undertaking of meeting the American Public, how would you feel about coming to Mt Lebanon and holding some sances here, in conjunction with our people? Would not the influences here be in every respect favorable? Could we not form a battery, composed of your natural Mediumship, the Shakers' acquired practical Spirituality, and those controlling Spirits, in the other world, who have the whole movement in charge?

In this work, should you, as Media, the Ruling Spirits, as Motors, and the Shakers, as Substrata, or working force, all concur and agree to confer together, and work together, I suggest that we invite some of the leading minds, in the Spiritual movement, to join with us in the public meeting.

I address you first, upon the subject, as being, in my estimation, the first Media in the known world.

You may lay this letter before such of the Spirits as you recognize as the highest—most divine—authority, with whom you associate.

In kind, respectful regard to yourself and Spiritual household, I am your friend,

F. W. Evans.

CHITTENDEN, VT., June 20, 1875.

FRIEND EVANS, This is our location at present. We are held here, by the bands that control in our sances, for a purpose known only to the Powers that control us. We shall wait their bidding.

Should they desire us to go to Mt. Lebanon, or anywhere else, we are ready. We trust in all their movements, knowing full well they will do all things right, and keep us where they can get the most power, and do the most good.

Let the Spirits make their own conditions, and the world will be convinced of the power of Immortality, as fast as they are prepared to be convinced.

Should we, on this side of the Spiritual or Spirit world, make conditions for the Spirits, there might be many pull-backs. We are not permitted to make any arrangements to go away from here, at present.

Best wishes from your friend, in the cause of truth,

H. G. Eddy.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR OF "THE SUN."

—O—

NEW YORK, June 14, 1875.

FRIEND EVANS, I don't know that I have ever expressed the sentiment to you, but it is proper that I should say frankly, that I have no personal conviction that materialization is a true thing. Neither do I care very much whether it is true or not. I have no idea whatever that witnesses from beyond the grave are of any value as teachers of Spiritual Truth. Truth must stand on its own merits, and if it were uttered by ten thousand spirits, it would not be a whit more true than when uttered by one man in the flesh.

Having said this, I will say that such a meeting as you propose would be immensely interesting and important. If it is really possible to produce a spirit from the other world in the appearance of an ordinary human body, and to have this spirit address an audience, the fact would produce an extraordinary excitement. Nothing that could occur, I suppose, would so deeply impress the minds of people in general; and, if it is practicable, I can see no objection to undertaking it. As for defraying the expenses, there would not be the slightest difficulty in having that done over and over again, by charging a small fee for admission; but a considerable force of police would probably be necessary to preserve order. Yours sincerely,

Charles A. Dana.

MT. LEBANON, June 16, 1875.

CHARLES A. DANA—Esteemed Friend:

Your note of 14th instant, is to the point. I did not suppose that, individually, you believed materialization a verity, or that to you, Truth would be more valuable for being uttered by a Spirit. You are a sensible man.

Are not old men for wisdom and history? If Moses and Elias were materialized to Jesus and Apostles, two points were made—First, that they did exist, and could prove it; Second, being older, by many hundred years, than any earthly man, they were more valuable, for history, than two new books.

To me, the natural law of materialization is an interesting scientific fact. I expect to instruct materialized spirits, not to be instructed by them. But the materialized spirits may be inspired by spirits superior to themselves.

Should we hold a meeting, as I propose, I hope to accomplish two objects. First, by the Mediums we will bring with us, to materialize

Spirits from the other world, who will appear as ordinary men and women, and speak to the audiences. Second, by the Spirits we will bring with us, to inspire the speakers thus materialized, so that they shall utter truths of great importance and of the highest order—truths that will be of practical use to society and to the attendants of said meeting.

A smith may work cold metals—he prefers working them at red heat.

Excitement with human beings is as heat or fire to metals. To be baptized with fire and with the Spirit of Truth, is to receive Truth—Spiritual Truth—under excitement.

Will not Wisdom be justified of her children, if materialization be a means to a good end? Respectfully,

F. W. Evans.

DEAR FATHER EVANS:

I have read your Autobiography through with a great deal of interest. It has given me a better idea of your life and work, and of many things connected with the Shakers than I ever had before. Your conversion to Shakerism and your labors for the good of humanity, in various reforms, will be better appreciated when many of your ideas on other matters are better understood by the mass of the people. I never heard the Book of Revelations so satisfactorily explained as you have explained it. Whether your views be correct, or not, I have seen no explanation so applicable.

Although many years of my early life were spent within a few miles of the Sonyea Shakers, I never knew much of their belief, nor of what they were aiming to do.

Your religion is practical—not theoretical. It goes to the bottom of things. It is calculated to revolutionize every thing in society. The present system of Marriage would be changed—the present system of Laws would be changed—Society would be reorganized—Churches, Schools, every thing, would be revolutionized. In fact, it seems to me, you would make one grand smash-up of things in general. And what is the object of all this? Would the Shaker programme make the world better and happier? Would it rid the world of disease, crime and sinners? Would it do away with premature death, poverty and other evils, to which the human family are subject, under existing conditions?

I always supposed, that if the Shaker programme was fully carried out—the sexes not allowed to come together for procreative purposes—that the earth would, in one or two generations, be depopulated entirely. I could see no way in which human life could be prolonged, unless you show that Shakerism would bring physical immortality to those who adopt it.

If, by joining the Shakers, physical immortality could be secured—the last enemy, death, be destroyed, or overcome—I could see strong attraction to Shaker society. Could you demonstrate the possibility of such result, you would soon convert the whole world to Shakerism. But thus far, Shakers die as well as other people, and I am not aware that the average of human life is much greater, with them, than with the gentile world.

The New Cycle, which I learn from you, the Shakers are about to enter upon, will offer something of a very important character for the consideration of thoughtful minds. The division of the human family into three or four orders, in which all, but the most robust, live celibate lives, will prevent the propagation of sin, disease and misery. Such propagation has gone on long enough. 'Tis high time sinners, criminals, diseased and deformed persons stop reproducing their kind. We have, already, more than enough of that kind of humanity on the earth. Has not society the right to compel the criminal, the diseased and deformed, to a life of continence—if need be, to take from them the power to reproduce their likeness? 'Twould be better for them, and better for society. They have no right to curse the world with marred types of humanity. It is a legitimate subject for governmental supervision.

The first thing required is a class of men, for Rulers, who are masters of themselves—men and women in whose organization the in-intellectual and moral forces are paramount, controlling all lower law influences.

No man nor woman is fit to make laws, administer them, or in any way govern or control others, who has not sovereign control of his and her own spirit and passions, so as to do right for the love of right.

When our public offices are filled with the right material—Law makers and Law administrators whose lives are devoted to Humanity's Elevation—Society's wrongs will be righted.

I see much in Shakerism that commends itself to my judgment. The intellectual and social life of communities could be made very pleasant. I never could see the use of the uniformity and monotony in your style of dress. Why not give to each a certain amount of money and let them dress to suit their own tastes? Nature loves variety. She never tries to duplicate herself. As your DRUG-FACTORY has burned down, why not use that force to cultivate flowers and fruits for market, and to beautify your homes—making them so attractive that every body will want to live with you? God has made flowers, birds and fruits, in such variety of beauty, color, plumage, flavor and odor, that it seems to me we should cultivate, use and enjoy them.

See what beauty and grandeur are in the sunlit clouds! in the variegated landscape! in the mountains! in the forests, and in the rainbow! Why not adorn your homes with copies of these also, and make those homes the Paradise the whole earth is to become in the Millennial Age?

You have the germs of that happy time. With perfect bodily health, the right kind of mental, moral and social surroundings, I fail to see why Shakers cannot begin the Millennial Age.

Yours with great respect,

Dr. E. P. Miller.

MT. LEBANON, June 17, 1875.

DEAR FRIEND MILLER: Your highly valued letter of the 14th is at hand. Let me get an article out of it for the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS. It is too good to lie idle in my desk. I shall use it, unless you say nay.

About the flowers and all that, there is no difference in principle. But about dress, you are intoxicated with the wine of Babylon. Your world's women are horribly ugly—no beauty about them—while Shaker women are the glory of the earth, and when materialized, at the Eddys, as they are, are admitted by all to be beauty incarnated. Your sense of beauty is perverted. It will come right, if you have a care of your diet.

Beauty rests upon utility. Also, we are only in our First Degree of the Seven. Let us alone until we grow up to the Ornamental. We want first to "clean escape the corruptions that are in the world through lust." Then, in this our Second Degree, we want to be freed from all physical diseases. We shall then have occasion for flowers, instrumental music, and cause for Ornamentation.

Sin, painted, is one of the most detestable of sights. When I look at world's women, bedecked with jewels and loaded down with dry goods, I keep thinking of the ills that female flesh is heir to, in this day. They should dress in "sack cloth and ashes," so that the inner and outer might agree.

Am always pleased to hear from you. Kind regards to your family, to friend Train, and to all friends.

F. W. Evans.

THE TELEGRAPH.

—O—

IN 1837, a year or two before Morse's discovery of the magnetic telegraph, two of the girls in the Second Family of Shakers at Watervliet, N. Y., were in Vision, as it was called. Unconscious of mortal surroundings, they lay on a bed in the east end of a long room, called the T room. The room was literally packed with standing spectators, witnessing the thrillingly interesting phenomena.

The door of entrance was at the opposite end of the room. I came in late and seated myself near the door. The girls could not possibly have seen me, had their eyes been open.

They had gone to a far distant city, in the Spirit World, where they met Mother Ann, with whom they had, in their Spirit World excursion, frequently met and become familiar. They were now conversing as if all girls together.

I spoke not a word, but simply thought, how can they make their bodies talk, when so far away as they claim to be? The girls ceased talking, as if listening. Presently one of them said: "Mother, some of the folks at home wonder how we can make our bodies talk when we are so far away."

After apparently listening to the response, she said: "Mother says, it is not we that make our bodies talk. It is our Guardian Spirits, who remain with our bodies, to keep the vital action, while we are gone."

I thought, how can their Guardian Spirits get their words so readily?

The girl seemed to listen, then said: "Mother, the folks at home wonder how our Guardian Spirits can get our words so readily."

After apparently listening, the girl said—or the Guardian Spirit said: "Mother says she don't know that she can make you understand that. It is by a kind of telegraph that we have in this world. You have nothing like it in your world now, but will have before long."

At the date aforesaid—1837—Telegraph meant an agreed upon flag, or other signal.

We were subsequently informed, in manner aforesaid, that Dr. Franklin, whose favorite amusement, here, was halter-breaking lightning, when in the next world, succeeded in harnessing a similar power, to the mail-stage there, and that the facilities by which we are now enabled to talk around the world, in almost less than no time, are the materialization of what had pre-existence in the Spirit World. It may be so with all our modern inventions—the inventor being the medium of transmission. Some inventions may be the re-materialization of lost arts.

MATERIALIZATION v. MATERIALISM.

—O—

THE star of "materialization" is in the ascendant just now, and thoughtful people are gazing heavenward with wonderstruck eye. And well they may, for this new constellation, glorious and bright, bids fair to eclipse with its splendor all the lesser lights that surround it; and the boasted inventions, discoveries and achievements of this steam and iron age, compared with this latest marvel, sink into insignificance.

Faith in the hereafter is the very basis of religion; and joyfully I hail "materialization," because I believe it is a weapon which, in the hands of the angels, will destroy that soul-stunting materialism that now rules a cold intellectual age. Even skeptics must accept the evidence of their senses, and worshippers at the shrine of reason dare not deny logical conclusions. If spirits can be handled, and weighed, and recognized, and can give conclusive proof of their identity, the inference is plain:—the spirit world exists, and communication between it and the earth is a possibility—truths which are indeed needed to warm and cheer the fainting hearts of the sons of men.

I have no theory to advance upon the subject. I have not, as yet, accurately determined the limits of spiritual forces, and admit that, to me, the accretion by a spirit of a physical body is no whit more wonderful than the growth of the tiniest plant. That which is unfamiliar we are apt to consider marvelous.

I think it was Bishop Berkeley who taught the subjectiveness of all phenomena, and the impossibility of proving the existence of any thing outside of our consciousness. I am at no pains to dispute this position, because the vast majority of people do believe in the material substantiality of their surroundings. When they see a man they are content to believe it is a man, and when they meet a mad bull, they carefully get out of his way, for fear of the very forcible and disagreeable fancy of being tossed on his horns. To such, I say, the evidence is strong that many spirits do appear in bodies as real, material and substantial as our own.

But I anticipate the skeptic's sneering and ironical assent. It does, indeed, seem to be incontestible that mediums do occasionally deceive, and that manifestations are sometimes simulated. But a hundred frauds can never annihilate one genuine manifestation, occurring under rigid test conditions; whereas one genuine manifestation is a complete offset to a thousand bogus Katie Kings. The fact that Brother Thomas Smith and Brother Daniel Sizer, at the Eddy homestead, did actually see and recognize departed friends—materialized forms that were visible to all present—is worth more than volumes of erudition and finished essays proving "materialization" a fraud and a delusion.

To me, it is a comfort to feel that the spirit-world is near, and that spirits are concerned for the welfare of humanity.

VISIT TO THE EDDYS.

—O—

KIND EDITOR SHAKER AND SHAKERESS: Thursday, April 22d, found Brother Daniel Sizer and your correspondent at Chittenden, Rutland county, Vt., the home of the much talked of Eddy brothers, mediums for spirit materializations. Presuming a short sketch of the facts seen, heard and felt would be of interest to many readers of your paper, I herewith tender the following account.

Chittenden, like many old settled New England townships, consists of a few straggling farm-houses, built near the most fertile spots of rough looking hills.

The particular house, made notorious by these materializations, is a plain one, standing a few feet back from the road, with some claims to modern additions in the shape of an Ell, running back from its center some 40 ft. with width of 20 ft., two stories high. The upper room of this addition being devoted to the spirits, is entered by a door in the back center of the old house. Its one large room is entirely unfurnished, with the exception of a stove, three or four common chairs, two long rough benches, a common table with leaves 4x2 ft., on which are placed various common musical instruments—violin, accordion, harmonicon, tin horns, bells, etc. At farther end of this room the floor is raised 2 ft., forming a platform 4 ft. wide by 2 ft. high, running the width of the room, and inclosed by a low railing, except at south end, where are steps. The cabinet is on this platform, and is formed by taking the space from the chimney (which stands in the center of back wall) to north side of building, inclosed with lath and plaster partition, leaving door space next to chimney, forming a room 8x2 ft. The doorway is covered by an old blanket, hung on hooks at upper end.

This evening, April 22d, there are eighteen persons present from various portions of this country and Canada. We assemble in the séance room at 7½ p. m., taking seats on the benches, the majority being on front bench, they joining hands. Wm. Eddy now enters the cabinet, while his brother, Horatio, takes a seat among the audience and plays upon a violin, accompanied by any one who can sing the various melodies—old religious hymns, spiritualist songs, ballads, negro melodies and sentimental songs.

In the course of five or ten minutes the curtain moves aside and there stands a spirit, so called. Presently the spirits step out on the platform, walk around, dance, speak, rap, materialize pieces of cloth out of nothing visible, call up some of the audience to feel of them, dance with them, etc. The light in the room, in the meantime, being a common kerosene lamp, burning at half light, then again turned up to full blaze, and held within 10 ft. of cabinet door, showing every feature as plain as daylight, color of hair, eyes, skin, clothing, every thing indicative of one's personality. Our first séance lasted fifty minutes, during which time my watch lay at my side, face open, and with pencil I noted the appearance of each spirit, time out, and length of time between their retiring into the cabinet and the appearance of another spirit. The shortest time being one and a half minutes. Fifteen different forms, of various sizes, appear this evening, some Indians, characteristically dressed in colored bead-work, belts, caps, leggings, etc., and a large proportion of the others recognized by different parties present as relations, etc. We attended four of these séances, with audiences varying from eight to twenty-four persons present, some constantly coming and going. In these four séances, forty-five different spirits made their appearance, all of whom were recognized by some one or other present. Some were able to speak; those seemed to be the most successful in doing so who had been materialized a number of times. Among the many occurrences interesting to the spectators, because of some personal peculiarity, deformity, or circumstance connected with them, allow me to mention a few.

A woman and her husband, of high social position and liberal means, form part of the audience before whom a spirit shows himself, a young man of twenty-five or thirty, with beard on lower part of face, dressed in black, whom they recognize as a nephew, called Charles. He walks back and forth on the platform, showing peculiarities of gait, build and dress, answers questions by raps and speech. At second appearance, he moves forward to railing and reaches his right hand out, beckoning to the woman to come forward, which she timidly does, extending her right hand, which he grasps with his right, and while shaking her hand, pats the back of her right hand with his left hand. This is in plain sight and audible to the whole company.

Again, a woman appears who is recognized as Ellen, a niece. Inquiry is made if her little child of three years is present, and can materialize. Affirmative response, and she retires into cabinet, to again appear in a few minutes, leading a little child at her side, whom she turns around, lifts up in her arms, bends down and kisses three times in a motherly fashion. Each person present receives tokens of recognition.

Aside from the materializations, we attended one each of the light and dark séances. In the light circle a curtain is drawn across the corner of room, behind which a table is placed, covered with the various musical instruments. The medium sits in a chair placed in front of curtain, some one selected from the audience sits beside him, with one arm bared to the shoulder, which the medium grasps with his hands. A blanket is now pinned around them both, leaving only their heads in view. The man's free hand is now thrust out of the blanket and held by some one of the audience. Immediately music begins, bells ring, horns blow, a guitar is thrust beyond the curtain in full view and played upon, horns are thrown over the curtain, hands appear and stroke the faces of those present, patting them, pulling their beards, etc. A pencil is taken by the spirit-hand and various signatures and messages written out upon cards, which are thrown out, together with various instruments, among the audience. Two one-quarter inch iron rings, of diameter sufficient to slip easily on upper arm, are next taken by the spirit-hand, and instantly the man next to medium finds them on his bare arm, without the medium moving his hands; all this while the large kerosene lamp stands at full blaze between the audience and medium.

In the dark circle things are somewhat different. The medium occupies a chair in the center of the floor, some six feet from the audience, one of whom ties his hands behind him with a rope, which is again secured to back of chair in which he sits; this is done as firm as ingenuity can do it. A man now takes his seat in the medium's lap, at the same time holding the hands of another person, who sits in front of him, but who might be supposed to be an interested party to the performance. The light is now extinguished. Then begins a medley of sounds, table moving and thumping, bells ring, voices speaking through trumpets, and finally playing upon instruments tones descriptive, of a storm at sea. Suddenly the instruments seem to be in all parts of the room, flying through the air, performing in concert the only music, worthy the name, which we have heard. This is very harmonious and pleasing, purporting to be a welcome of some parties to Spirit-land. In the midst of it comes a crash, and all is still as death for a moment, when some one remarks, "You have broken the circle, by releasing hands," which proves incorrect. A noise now commences as of a number of men running around the room, dancing, whistling, whooping, stamping, playing rough music, which continues ten minutes, when the spirits, speaking through the trumpet, say that a company of wild Indians had taken possession of the place and drove away those who were performing. The lamp is now relit, and the musical instruments found in different parts of the room, with mediums tied as at first, and in same place. Cord examined and found all right. Light extinguished, when the spirit welcome is finished—verses are improvised by spirit voices, on any subject selected by those present. A short lecture delivered, various questions answered, and séance concludes.

Among the spirits who materialize is a woman, whom they all seem to venerate, known as the Witch of the Mountains. She comes upon the platform with a quiet dignity, speaks in a clear incisive tone, pointedly and to the purpose, rising to eloquence in her language and delivery, teaching the highest moral lessons, and always making a deep impression on her hearers. On one of these occasions, when we were present, she spoke for ten minutes in a voice loud enough to be heard two hundred feet, by a large audience. She made the statement, that within five years it would be a common occurrence for spirits to speak from the rostrum, to meet friends in their homes and in the street, and be as familiar as mortals. She has made the assertion that it will be done at Chittenden, in broad daylight, in 1875.

An incident of our last séance may be of interest to many. There appeared a Shaker sister, whom the audience recognized as a Quakeress, while we knew her as one of our sisterhood, who departed many years since. She answered many questions, and was succeeded by another sister, who had deceased only a few months, who also answered questions. They were both unmistakably dressed in full Shaker costume, even to cap and handkerchief. This of course was very satisfactory to us—their names, Mary Ann Patterson and Martha Poole—special friends.

I have met many, since our visit, who were anxious in their inquiries, and all evidently interested in some form or other. To those, who have not seen or heard, queries numberless present themselves, as to the reality and meaning of it all. I unhesitatingly pronounce the materialization genuine—a reality. Its morality does not seem to be a point in the case at present. It is an open avenue through which comes a stream of human souls, vividly suggestive of society here good, bad and indifferent, without any, at present, apparent object in view, but the satisfaction arising from a re-union with earthly friends. As to the meaning or possibilities in the case, I hazard no opinion, for they seem illimitable.

Here is a new force developed, unique and without precedent in the realms of science—a force evidently capable of changing the whole face of society. New channels of thought open, and new modes of revealing to human beings the hidden secrets of God and nature by means of which the creation of new heavens and a new earth—a re-organization of all mundane institutions—is reduced to a mere matter of time.

HOW TO EAT.

BEFORE a man becomes hungry, watchful nature has calculated, in her way, how much nutriment the body needs, and provides as much of a liquid substance as will be necessary to prepare from the food which may be eaten, that amount of sustenance which the system may require. When this is stored up and all is ready, the sensation of hunger commences, and increases with the steadily increasing amount of the digesting material just referred to, and the very instant the first mouthful of food is swallowed, this "gastric juice" is poured out into the stomach through a thousand sluices; but no more has been prepared than was necessary, for nature does nothing in vain; so that if a single mouthful more of food has been swallowed than the untempted or unstimulated appetite would have called for, there is no gastric juice for its solution, and it remains but to fret and worry and irritate for hours together. If the amount eaten is much in excess, the stomach, as if in utter discouragement at the magnitude of its task, ceases its attempts at digestion, and forthwith commences the process of ejecting the unnatural load by means of nausea and vomiting in some cases; in others, it remains for an hour or more like a weight, a hard round ball, or a lump of lead, an uneasy heaviness; then it begins to "sour," that is, to decompose, to rot, and the disgusting gas or liquid comes up into the throat, causing more or less of a scalding sensation from the pit of the stomach to the throat; this is called "heart-burn." At length the half-rotten mixture is forced out of the mouth by the outraged stomach with that horrible odor and taste with which every glutton is familiar. In some cases the stenchy mass is passed out of the stomach downwards, causing, in its progress, a gush of liquid from all parts of the intestinal canal to wash it with a flood out of the system; this is the "diarrhea" which surprises the gourmand at midnight, or in the early morning hours, when a late or overhearty meal has been eaten. When sufficient food has been taken for the amount of gastric juice supplied, hunger ceases, and every mouthful swallowed after that, no gastric juice having been prepared for its dissolution, remains without any healthful change, inflaming, and irritating, and exhausting the stomach by its efforts to get rid of it, and this is the first step toward forming "dyspepsia," which becomes more and more deeply fixed by every repeated outrage, until at length it remains a life-time worry to the mind, blinding it with horrible imaginings, and a weary wasting torture to the body, until it passes into the grave.

The moral of this article is, that the man who forces his food, he who eats without an inclination, and he who strives by tonics, or bitters, or wine, or other alcoholic liquors, to get up an appetite, is a sinner against body and soul—a virtual suicide!—Hall's Journal of Health.

DEAR SHAKER AND SHAKERESS:

Much might be said and written on the subject of health. We should consider the health of the soul as well, or even more, than the health of the body. If we transgress the laws of nature the body has to pay the penalty, and it is just that it should. If we transgress the laws of God the soul must pay the penalty. It behooves us, therefore, to watch; be careful what we eat and drink, that our bodies may be a healthy abode for a righteous soul to dwell in, as the body and soul are so closely connected now, until this body shall have ended its course; then let us think how are matters with the soul. The soul that sinneth shall die, was, and is and forever will be the irrevocable decree of the Almighty. All men have sinned and fallen short of their duty; and the 144,000 who stood on Mt. Zion with the Lamb had all been sinners, but now are without fault, etc. O, what a happy and cheering thought that the way is now opened that sinners may return, for now is come salvation and strength and the kingdom of our God and the power of his Christ. Then let us begin the reform now, to-day if ye will; let us have a healthy soul and body; let us cut off all that is offensive to either; let us cut off all unnatural stimulants, should it even be as dear to us as the right eye or arm, or even no matter how long we have been accustomed to them; let us all be new creatures in Christ, and let the time past suffice to have lived after the course of the world; but now let us come out and be separate. I am ready, willing and anxious for a step forward, upward and onward for ever.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

PERSECUTION, IDOLATRY, INFIDELITY.

—o—

It may be much easier to define Persecution—to portray its spirit and animus—if not to fix its boundaries—than to decide what is real Idolatry or Infidelity, when adjudged at the high court, where Justice and Truth are the arbiters. Persecution has its root in the wild raging passions of men, in the war spirit,—under the guise of religious zeal—and is fed from the same source, vain ambition, bigotry, superstition and the lust of power and dominion. The heathen nations, and the ancient Jews, were great warriors; and although the Jews sought the aid, and claimed the protection of their God in their battles, they were not as intolerant in regard to religious opinions as their descendants. Pagans, Mohammedans, and the great variety of Christians (so called), have all their peculiar gods to worship, each pitted against the other, who, like Saul of olden time, have thought they were doing God service in persecuting and torturing one another for opinion's sake.

Religious wars, of all others, have been the most ruthless and unrelenting. The blood-stained pages of history reveal the sad fact, that millions of human beings have been subjected to physical and mental anguish, to force them to accept opinions repugnant to them, and when that did not effect their purpose, death, in its most cruel form, was inflicted by those who had the power. Such the fruit of Church and State synthesis.

Constantine, the first Christian emperor, made it a penal offense for a Christian to become a Jew, and forbade Pagan worship in any form. He razed their temples to the ground, and the Fathers of the Church eulogized him for his edicts against Pagan worshipers. He held the balance of power in his hand, and made the sword his arbiter.

Augustine claimed the sanction of the Old Testament scriptures, when he passed sentence of death upon those who celebrated certain rites, which, but a short time previous, had been tolerated. Multitudes were branded as heretics, and suffered death in its most agonizing forms, under the pretense of defending the Christian religion! It is recorded that the worship of images cost five hundred thousand lives. The doctrine of Transubstantiation four hundred thousand more. The persecution of the Manicheans, instigated by Theodora, resulted in the sacrifice of one million lives in Greece alone. Their great crime consisted in believing there are two eternal principles. One, light, representing good; the other, darkness, representing evil. The great loss of life by Crusaders is estimated at five millions.

Mosheim says, that the "European nations were deprived of the greatest part of their inhabitants. For centuries, the fairest portions of earth were reddened with human blood, and strewn with human skulls."

Pagans, Catholics, Heterodox, Schismatics and Protestants, all, when they have had the power, were sure to use the sword, the gibbet, the dungeon and the rack, in the name of God. We learn from history that the Catholics slew thirty thousand in one day, and when the leaders of the massacre could no longer discern their own people from the heretics, the Pope's legate cried with a loud voice, "Kill on; God will know His own."

Buckle states, that about one million of the most industrious inhabitants of Spain were hunted like wild beasts, and thousands were butchered on the road to Africa. How many thousands of Jews have been robbed, plundered, hanged, head downward between dogs, burned and impaled, while priests, directly or indirectly, have conducted the slaughter, will probably never be known until the recording angels shall open the great Book laid up in the archives in the unseen land of light, where all false coverings are removed, and things are called by their real names, and made to appear just as they are.

Queen Isabella banished hundreds of thousands from Spain, and tens of thousands were killed, and vast numbers perished from famine and pestilence. Eighty thousand besides, were baptized by force, and their children coerced from them to be educated in the CHRISTIAN FAITH! The famous schism that preceded the burning of Huss, and the Wars consequent, cost one hundred and fifty thousand lives; and millions of the Aborigines in America were sacrificed on the altar of the Catholic faith by the priesthood and their abettors. The massacre of St. Bartholomew, it is said, cost fifty thousand lives.

One writer states that the whole religious influence of Spain was exerted to hasten the catastrophe which deprived twelve millions innocent individuals of life and happiness, to add to the glory of a merciful God.

In the reign of Charles V. from fifty to one hundred thousand were immolated for their faith, and many thousands more in the reign of his son. A mandate went forth from the Church in the fifteenth century which condemned all the inhabitants of the Netherlands to death, who were deemed guilty of heresy, and the king confirmed the decree. Three millions of people, men, women and children, says Motley, were sent to the scaffold in three lines. In Spain, three hundred and twenty thousand were burned, and subjected to various kinds of torture by the Inquisition.

Need we go farther to define what Persecution is? or to show its origin other than by the effects produced? Where is the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world" (errors in belief or practice)? who said: "Love your enemies." "My servants will not fight?"

Protestant Christianity has lighted the fires of persecution—whenever opportunity has offered—which have contained as much caloric, and whose flames have risen as high as have either Pagan or Catholic. Scotch bishops and the English church united in their fiendish plans to brand the Dissenters, as they were called, with hot irons, and tear their ears from their roots, and whip women through the streets, because they dared to dissent from the ritualism of the church. The Scotch Presbyterians exercised the cruel spirit of persecution to the extent of their power.

The burning of Servetus was approved by Protestants, and Calvin gloried that he had revenged the blasphemies of Servetus, by burning his physical body. Malanthon showed his approval of the diabolical deed, when he wrote to Calvin that "the Church owed him a debt of gratitude for so doing, and that his magistrate acted justly in thus suppressing heresy." His chief offense was, that he claimed that Jesus Christ was not the Son of God from all eternity, but only since His incarnation. On that point he was heterodox; other than that it seems he was orthodox—a Protestant Christian.

The Anabaptists were greatly persecuted for their notions concerning infant baptism. The persecutions in regard to witchcraft and sorcery have been equally balanced between Catholics and Protestants, according to the power possessed by each. Luther, in theory and practice, advocated vindictive measures to suppress heresy. He said, "I would show no mercy—have no compassion on those witches." Puritanism, in effect, was no better—was the same in spirit, if not in degree.

New England eclipsed the glory of American history by her bloody deeds and intolerant spirit toward the Quakers, and by hanging witches. Think of it, in New England thirteen women and six men were hanged for witchcraft, and one man, eighty years old, was crushed to death under a board loaded with stones. Quakers had their ears cut off, were whipped and hanged; women were tied to cart-tails in the dead of winter, in a half nude state, and whipped through towns. Dark indeed is the cloud that rests over that sad chapter in the history of New England! But to the honor of New England it must be said, that much has been done to wipe out the foul stains stamped upon her pages of history.

Thousands of heinous cruelties and crimes might be cited, to show how far a blind zeal, instigated by an ambitious bigoted priesthood, will carry its subjects. The war spirit, whatever form it may assume, or name it may bear, proceeds from beastly passions. In all ages the lust of power is fed from the hells, while it usurps the authority to bind the consciences of men and women, and kill the prophets.

Let us inquire, "Who among all the orthodox and heterodox sects have been the Idolaters, and who have worshiped the true and living God?" Can we marvel that so many thousands should ask, "What is Christianity? Where and what its fruits?" Can Paganism, Mahomedanism or Judaism present more atrocious crimes than are found in the annals of what is called sacred history? Who will decide and point out with precision, the Heretics, the Idolaters, or the Infidels in the past, or at the present time? God sees and judges differently from men. He looks at the heart—judges the motives by the fruits produced.

The important subject now agitating the minds of deep and free-thinkers in Europe and America is, "Shall the beastly powers again ascend the throne and rule the consciences of the people as in the past, either through Papal supremacy, making a god of the pope, by giving him unlimited sway, or by placing the Protestant's God in the constitution of the American government?" Who wants to bend their necks to receive the usurper's yoke? Will America's sons and daughters consent to have their consciences bound to credal forms of belief and worship, by church and State power, or to be branded and punished as heretics? As well might we sing, "Carry me back to the dark ages—to the Inquisition, the faggot and flame," instead of struggling to roll forward the car of progress, and talk of religious liberty.

Clouds that portend a storm are gathering, they are ominous. Mutterings which were at first but faintly heard in the distance grow louder and draw nearer. It would be well for us all to remember, that "God is not a respecter of persons," of names, sects nor professions. But they who seek to know, understand and do the truth, regardless of what it may cost, are His elect.

"LIVING WATERS."

JESUS, while upon earth, uttered the following memorable words: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst."

The spiritual signification of water, throughout the scriptures, seems to be a continual inspiration of Truth; something vitally necessary to spiritual growth, and health—moving—Living waters—nothing stale and dead.

The very best and clearest water, as it bubbles up from its source on the mountain side, or taken from the running streamlet in the valley—if allowed to remain for a long time, even in the purest and most costly vessel—will gather, from the surrounding atmosphere, those noxious gases, which living things are continually giving off in the different processes of growth, transformation and decay, and become dead—unfit for use. They are no longer living waters, containing the inspiration and vigor which are derived from them, when drank from the spring, or the flowing stream; but are a prolific source of disease and danger.

On the contrary, the living waters of which Christ spake are continually springing up unto eternal life. They have the elements of life in them, which keep them constantly in motion. Their principle of life, like that of every thing in nature, is in constant activity. Still, pent-up waters grow foul, and stagnant, and will not support animal life, unless it be the lowest forms.

The vital significant truths, which it was the mission of Jesus to reveal, possess life-giving elements, and are as living waters to souls. There is power in them, evincing that they come from, and keep their connection and communion with the Fountain Head—the source whence they came. Those who profess to drink of the waters of life, unless they manifest inspirational life, and have that life to bestow on the thirsty famishing children of earth, how can they claim to constitute the Body of Christ—his Church? Have they, in their keeping, the testimony, the sound of which is as the "voice of many waters," which proclaims them to be the living servants of Christ? "By their fruits ye shall know them." A living, breathing pulsation from the great Fountain Head, and manifesting itself in stainlessness of life, and through consecration to good and holy uses, toward all with whom they come in contact, especially the "household of faith," is proof that they have drank of those living waters; for by their acts, they show that they are vitalized by the pure and glowing love of the Divine Parentage, and have bathed in the waters of repentance.

If they follow their exemplar, in that repentance, which is unto life, will they not, like him, be willing to come to any "John the Baptist," who may be in order as a witness for God, and confess their sins—reveal the history of their lives?

The Scripture record of him is, "He was tempted in all points as we are, but without sin." Also, that "He learned obedience by the things he suffered." However that may be, it seems that he cheerfully submitted to the olden time rite, for the cleansing of the people; and in a child-like spirit, as was his wont, he said to his external Baptizer, "Suffer it" etc.

That Jesus was a chosen medium to receive a baptism of the Christ-Spirit, there need be no doubt. And that he was attended from his childhood days with a guardian Spirit, who instructed, and prepared him for that event, we have strong evidence. At the early age of twelve years, when he said to his sorrowing earthly parents, who had diligently sought him three days, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" he seemed to be impressed that he had some important mission to perform.

We are left in the dark concerning many years of his history; are only informed that "He grew in stature, and in favor with God and man." His season of temptation, which was painfully trying and severe—of which it is stated he fasted forty days and forty nights—was succeeded by beautiful ministrations from Angels; and thenceforward, his life seemed pervaded with a continual influx of good, which he ministered to his disciples and all who were willing to receive. In that noble, generous heart, there was no shrinking from duty. Through self-renunciation, and holy consecration, he endured and suffered, that he might benefit others, until his mission on earth was fulfilled.

He said, "he would send the Comforter" to his little Band; and promised, that those who would drink of his cup and be baptized with his baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost, should do greater works than he had done. Which promise was verified.

E. H. Webster, Harvard, Mass.

DO GOOD.

"Do good and cast it into the sea; if the fishes do not regard it, God will." This, though an ancient Arab saying, strengthens the belief that no good deed goes unrewarded, however indifferent the receiver of such an act may appear. Do good and bless life by your existence. Make better the place where you hold a right; let no opportunity pass unimproved. The way to increase our own happiness is to make others happy; it being "more blessed to give than to receive." In how many little ways we could, by an unselfish spirit, lighten the burdens of the overborne, and cheer the drooping spirit of a friend, or companion, if our aim be to assist others and be always doing good.

"Be kindly affectioned one to another, in honor preferring one another," are the words of the Apostle; which, if lived out, would lead to acts of self-denial and care, lest we mar the happiness of another. "Life is made up of atoms;" and if they all tend to promote goodness, how blest the reward! "What we sow we must surely reap;" and who would not prefer a harvest of good deeds, kind words and affectionate regards, to that of wrongdoing, unkindness and hatred? We were intended as blessings, having power to be angels of love to each other. We have read that satan can appear as an angel of light, and misguide the unwary who are not wakeful in duty; but he never can be transformed into an angel of love, which we have the privilege of becoming.

We can make life pleasant, by improving the opportunities for doing good; or unpleasant, by counting all the disagreeables of life as insurmountable obstacles, and continually looking on the dark side; thus not only robbing ourselves of peace and quiet, but casting over others a chilling and blighting influence.

Do good; rise in the morning with this determination in your heart, renew it every hour; and bless society by your associations.

"Little acts of kindness, little words of love, Make this earth an Eden like the Heavens above."

The principle of preferring others to ourselves opens a way for all to receive acts of love and care. If our aim be to do good and make happy our sister and brother, who toil with us, and they, in turn, are governed by the same spirit to do good to us, then are we all made better by our unselfish aims.

Let us do good, for large is the field in which to labor, and we shall be more than compensated for all the self-sacrifice that such a course requires.

GOOD INTENTIONS.

How many there are who begin life's varied pursuits with good intentions, looking to the future with bright and sanguine hopes for success; and yet how many fail, sadly fail, of realizing those anticipations. Meaning to do well they become, in a measure, satisfied with their intentions, instead of actual good works. Thus they pass along till overtaken by misfortune, or the accumulation of neglected duties, while many of the most valuable years of health and vigor are squandered, and golden opportunities lost. We have never heard of the individual who became accomplished mentally or morally without a constant effort and application, meeting trials and disappointments withal. Let us learn endurance, and though we often fail of reaching the desired object, what has been accomplished may be again, with the same patience and unflinching courage. Each failure should serve to stimulate the mind and renew the energies for greater action. If "All real good is on the mountain top," then we must go up there to get it; and our trials and failures may prove, in the end, to be the very stepping-stones or means of our ascent to its summit.

Canterbury, N. H.

CONVERSATION.

AMONG the pleasant hours of entertainment, recreation and rest, are those of good solid conversation, wherein minds, through reciprocity of ideas, become enlightened, educated and possessors of others' thoughts. There is great beauty in, and profit derived from proper conversation; but they are not found in the surface talk which readily flows from superficial thinkers, who seek to entertain with the sheer nothings that pass and repass upon the stage of human existence.

When we come in contact with minds sensibly alive to great vital principles, with treasured items of useful knowledge which they are willing to impart, who take note of passing events, study causes and their results, by which they are able to discern the future, we are instructed; we intuitively feel that they drink deeply from the inspirational fount of learning—the Universe. If our feelings are consonant with theirs, we take pleasure while in conference with them, and we also are inspired with the noble theme of living to do and to acquire good.

Conversational powers are enhanced and sustained by individual effort, for information and improvement. "Genius unexercised is like the moth that flutters around a candle until it is scorched to death." Genius properly exercised, made active by being brought into service, is an educator, whether in a moral, intellectual or spiritual point of view, and is principally, at our own option, our own work.

We are surrounded with the means of education, and it remains with us whether we will employ the agencies placed within our reach, or not. Continued industry and close thought are requisite to reveal the lustre of pure Truth. Reason is applicable to all Truth, whether Natural, Scientific or Religious. Nature itself is a never-ending volume, from which a great variety of lessons may be learned.

The varied incidents of life through which we pass make diversified impressions upon different minds. Exchanging the various thoughts and views impressed upon minds of different cast from our own, augments our store of knowledge, intensifies thought, elucidates the power of perception, and lengthens the radius of meditation.

The exchange of thought by fitting conversation is like genial rays of sunshine to warm and vivify the heart, strengthen and give activity to the brain, and chase away the clouds of doubt and uncertainty that gather around and prevent the free exercise of the intellectual powers. By culture we grow in intelligence, and become useful members of society here, and by the same means we must prepare ourselves for the companionship of immortals, and to ornament the courts of heaven.

If all, in early life, would devote their minds to subjects both useful and interesting, that would demand the application of the faculties according to their age, they would learn that happiness increases as knowledge and industry increase; and they would erect a fortress against temptation. Instead of pursuing self-gratification with eagerness and seeking happiness in vanity and romance, which lead to dissolute habits, there would be a calm and settled purpose of mind and a growing thirst for substantial knowledge and wisdom that would elevate and refine.

If woman would detach herself from the artificial and vain, and devote her powers of mind to the substantial and true, what an influence she would wield over the destiny of our race! The love and gentleness of her nature need not be diminished thereby; but all the true womanly qualifications, devoid of voluptuous delicacy, would be retained, and she would arise as a power for good, to educate the lowly, and in all her words and acts bear aloft the standard of moral purity, and make the world better, politically, morally and spiritually.

EMBLEMS OF SPRING.

—o—

Beneath the long despotic reign
Of Winter's icy hand,
How manifold the forms of life
That sleep within the land.
His frigid fingers touch the trees,
The grass, and flowers bright,
His chilling breath the waters close
In slumbers of the night.

But ever on the earth revolves
Around the orb of light,
And each gyration nearer brings
The morning of delight,—
When 'neath the warm and genial rays
That fall to bless the land,
The germs of life in seed and bud,
In loveliness expand.

And sparkling waters hurst the crust
That hushed their murmurous flow,
The tender grasses pierce the sod,
To feel the sunbeam's glow.
In rainbow tints and sweet perfume,
Are robed the smiling flowers;
By force unseen, their beauty's wrought
From sunlight and from showers.

The leafy tongues of forest trees
Unite each happy note
With light winged birds, whose mingled songs
Upon the breezes float.
And o'er us bend the graceful boughs,
All wreathed in blossoms fair,
A prophecy of ripened fruit,—
A recompense for care.

When selfishness and sin possess
Dominion in the heart,
They sternly hold a frigid power
That chills the spirit part.
But if we turn to seek the light
That cometh from above,
We'll feel the warmth of angel life
In sunny beams of love.

They will the icy coverings melt,
Of envy, hate, and fear,
And joyously will Spring's bright morn
Within the soul appear.
The plants of virtue then will grow,
Life's fountains he unsealed,
And latent energies awake,
That long have been concealed.

Affections pure like early flowers
From wintry slumbers start,
'Mid verdancy of good desires
Upspringing in the heart.
The tree of endless spirit life
Unfolds its fragrant bloom,
In token of the precious fruit
That never finds the tomb.

We see that this exterior sphere
Is clothing for the soul,
Which is the vitalizing force
That animates the whole.
The glorious sun that giveth life
To all material things,
That from a dark chaotic state,
Such wondrous beauty brings,—
Is but an emblem of the Truth,
The motive power—Love,
The element in which our souls
Have being, live and move.

DIET.

—o—

We read that Felix listened to Paul, while he reasoned of Righteousness, Temperance and Judgment. If the Apostles of Jesus, eighteen centuries ago, reasoned upon righteousness and temperance, What is the duty of the advocates of the Christian religion, after the growth and development of reason and science, for so many ages? There are many preachers of righteousness at the present time, who are doing a good work in staying the flood of intemperance in drinking. But to be temperate in all things is a duty that intelligent beings owe to others, and to their own well-being.

The subject of proper diet has occupied my thoughts from time to time; but I must confess that I have been a transgressor of the laws of hygiene; some times through ignorance, at other times, through weakness and force of circumstances. How unstable and irresolute are poor mortals, many times, when placed in the way of temptation; and how easily drawn aside from the path of rectitude! It is lamentable to see how large the number of people, in the nineteenth century, who profess to be free, and still are slaves to abnormal appetites.

Intemperance in eating is as pernicious, if indulged to the same extent, as intemperance in drinking. Eating improper food, and at irregular hours, deranges the stomach, poisons the system, produces dyspepsia, that vexatious affliction upon human beings, and is a destroyer of peace and happiness, resulting in misery and premature death.

The life of a real dyspeptic is fraught with pain and sorrow. The path which he or she travels is oftentimes despondent and gloomy! Dark caverns appear before them and they are filled with fearful forebodings of the future! Again, hopes brighten, and the spirits are exhilarant; signs and scenes are fitful and changing. We cannot violate the laws of health, without paying the penalty. We may flatter ourselves with the delusive hope that we shall pass unharmed if we indulge in all the tempting luxuries of life in meats and drinks. The same deceptive spirit, that ages ago said "Thou shalt not surely die," to-day walks in our midst, says the same things and lures thousands to commit sins against their bodies and souls.

Stimulating drinks, hot cakes—all nice and white—rich mince pies, pastry and sweetmeats—made delicate and palatable—are disease-producing causes. How much time and strength are unwisely spent in the preparation of unhealthy food; thus aiding the weak to continue their unphysiological self-indulging habits and appetites.

Dwelling in illy-ventilated rooms, which are warmed by tight stoves, accompanied with stimulating drinks and unwholesome diet, is a prolific source of disease, sorrow and death. Hence, of the millions of human beings born of diseased parents, every year, only a fractional part reach maturity; and especially in our own country, at the present time, we see a generation of weak, puny youth and children, upon whom, in a few years, must rest the burden and responsibility of framing laws, and of sustaining the republican institutions, in what is called free America. To the same source, Believers in Christ's Second Appearing must also look for members to replenish their ranks. And they who are called to constitute the highest Spiritual Church on earth—by living a pure, virgin life, a life of consecration in all things—should be saviors from physiological sins, as well as the sins which relate more particularly to the soul. To eat and drink for strength—for use—and not for gratification and gluttony, should be the law of God's house. We may speak as with the tongue of Angels, and make loud professions of Faith; but by our works we shall be known—by the fruits brought forth we shall be judged.

If we are transgressors of the laws of life and health, relating to body or soul, how can we become saviors—helpers to others in like condition? Instead of unbosoming their sorrows and showing the causes of their infirmities, as the sick patient would confidentially approach a skillful physician, would they not say, "Physician, first heal thyself?"

There are multitudes of people in our day, who profess the healing art, and point out a panacea for all the ills of soul and body, and are prepared to reform every body but themselves. When we see reformers who have first reformed themselves, who will practically demonstrate how they have done it, then we have confidence that they understand how to administer the healing balm to others.

When I cast my eyes over society, and reflect how many friends—near and dear companions—have gone down to premature graves, my heart bleeds, and my spirit is pained! I yearn for a higher state of things, when sickness, pain and untimely death will not bear rule as in the past. I pray for the ushering in of new earthly conditions, to prepare the way, and make room for greater spiritual, heavenly truths; that the kingdom of heaven may come so perfectly on earth, that God's will may be done by healthy souls in healthy bodies; and that all who profess to belong in that kingdom, will have learned the all important lesson, "Eat to live, and not live to eat."

The "Shaker and Shakeress" is a small sheet, but contains many weighty truths, and is doing a good work. Indeed, there are inspirational effusions from almost every article comprised therein, which are instructive and strengthening. Its deep tones sound aloud, and continuously call to higher action. May its voice, as a spiritual messenger, be heard far and near, even to the remotest isles. The millennial truth must go forth from Zion, and the time is hastening when it will be said, "The law of use is the law inscribed on every vessel in the Lord's house, and nothing shall hurt nor harm in all His holy mountains." Slaughtering dumb animals for food will be among the things of the past, and there will be no more use for poisonous drugs to counteract the poison taken in the human system by unhealthful food and drink.

We see cause of rejoicing, that the downy beds, which a few years ago were held in high esteem throughout the country, and were used quite extensively, are now considered disease generators, and have gone into disrepute and disuse. It is a hopeful sign. Let all of Zion's children be of one heart and mind, and bless every effort at true reformation, strengthen others who are weak, by being strong in the truth, and thus lead on to victory.

FEMALE VOTING.

—o—

A DECISION has been reached in the United States Supreme Court, which seems to settle the status of women as qualified voters. In the case of Minor v. Hoppersatt, the decision, while conceding that women are citizens of the United States, and of the State where they reside, fails to make them voters by virtue of such residence. The court were unanimous in the opinion that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one. That right is made one of the attainable privileges of a citizen and is not an absolute one. The United States possesses no voters. Their officers are chosen directly or indirectly by the voters of States. To vote for Federal officers, one must be first competent to vote for State officers. Women cannot become voters, therefore, until authorized by the respective States in which they reside.

VICTOR HUGO has taken his stand in favor of Woman's Rights. In a recent letter to the French Society for the Amelioration of the Position of Women, he said that all the efforts of his life had been to secure a better lot for women, and added "Man has been the problem of the eighteenth century, woman is the problem of the nineteenth; and to say woman is to say child, that is to say the future. The question thus put appears in all its gravity. It is in its solution that lies the supreme social appeal. Woman can do all for man—nothing for herself. The laws are imprudent to make her so feeble when she is so powerful. Let us recognize that feebleness and protect it; let us recognize that power and direct it. There lies the duty of man; there lies also his interest. I do not tire of saying the problem is put; it must be solved. Whoever bears a part of the burden ought to have a part of the privileges. Half of the human race is outside equality; it must be made to re-enter. It will be one of the great glories of our great century to give the rights of the woman as a counterbalance to the rights of the man—that is to say, to put the laws in equilibrium with the customs."

GERMS OF TRUTH.

MT. LEBANON, N. Y.

1. There are germs of truth up - on the earth, That nev - er have been known, And seeds of grace in ev - ry heart That an - gels there have sown;
2. The type of many un - born flow - ers, Are placed be - fore our eyes; We catch a hope they yet will bloom, And then the vis - ion dies;

They struggle 'neath the heav - y soil That shrouds the land to - day, The seeds of er - ror check their growth, Im - pede their up - ward way.
But when the mag - ic spir - it power Of an - gel min - is - try, Shall rule the el - e - ments of earth, All life the good will see.

And we who 'neath God's holy light
Sad winter little know,
May lend a summer's warmth to aid
The soul in grace to grow.
And we will pierce the threatening clouds
'Till sunshine floods the earth,
'Till it reveals the mighty strength
And depth of angel worth.

And we will seek in every heart
To find the germs of truth,
And breathe thereon the holy life
Of everlasting youth;
Then, when the eventide of years
Around our spirits close,
No lingering fear or sad regret
Shall mark the last repose.

GIFT OF LOVE.

-o-

I.

My heart nurs'd wishes for a gift,
But somehow dared not to express them;
In silence only, and when left
Alone, 'twould fondle and caress them.
I knew it could not be for gold,
For that is worthless to the spirit,
Who toil'd for years in mother's fold
Heaven's inner kingdom to inherit.
Nor could it care to wish for fame;
O, nay — for who could wish to find it?
Nor even less for titled name —
All these were things long left behind it.
And so what could it be but Love —
That gentle spirit, guiding many?
Some angel did my doubts remove;
It was the gift of Love, if any!
And season went and season came,
And wonder'd at a world so funny;
And still my wishes were the same,
And still the skies looked bright and sunny!

II.

One afternoon I plowed the sod
With steady hand and quiet feeling,
When lo! I felt the Love of God
On snowy wings around me stealing.
And then I knew my heart had dared
To give expression to its wishes,
And God in His great Love prepared
Not only loaves, but also fishes!

And since that hour this gift of love
Hath left my heart not for a minute;
What'er befall, where e'er I move,
This heav'nly gift is always in it.
'Tis there! I feel it when I kneel
At eve with those beloved in heaven,
Or when I rise at morn I feel
The gift I wished for, God hath given!

C. A. Emil Fickeyson.

WHITE WATER, January 17, 1875.

To me, it is not a matter of dispute whether in Jesus, the first Christ was manifested to men, or not. I accept him as typical of said Order, in the distant past, as in the coming future. If Jesus was not the first unearthen man, I shall be happy in knowing that of Christs there are millions, seeing I can partake of their spirits and powers.

Question — What does the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS do?

Answer — It stops one of the gaps in the wall of the world's complaints — that we never go out to proclaim our principles and give to seekers of the truth, a reason for the faith that is in us. It bears witness, to the world, of the reality of physical — Spirit — manifestations — but not of the truthfulness of supermundane communications from the lower spheres.

As a medium of present revelations, from the higher spheres, it is edifying to the saints.

James S. Prescott, North Union, Ohio.

"THE history of the past and the experience of the present show that the best men and women have suffered most severely in their reputations; have been reviled, persecuted and crucified. It would seem as if these revilings and persecutions were proportioned to the purity and goodness of the individual.

"A decent respect for the opinions of others, and a proper love of approbation, stimulate us to do right; but at the same time, there is a true and noble independence which results from right actions, that lifts us above the influence of malice and slander, and the well-poised mind is not moved by these, except with feelings of pity for those who indulge in them."

Henry T. Child, M. D.

PERFECTION.

-o-

My God, my home, my precious call,
Ideal grace unfold;
I see that glory in them all,
Which ancient seers foretold.
My God is perfect, true and wise,
And while this God is mine,
Perfection will alone suffice
In life that is divine.

How much salvation do we ask?

For it a price we give,
If only from the grosser ills,
From these remote we live.
If we desire the saving power,
From every thought of sin,
We give our all, from hour to hour,
'Till we perfection win.

Mary Whitcher, Canterbury, N. H.

CREMATION.

-o-

CREMATION, in India, is the cause of the Asiatic cholera. Let Americans, who have plenty of land, bury their dead, far enough apart, to plant a tree by each grave — have all funeral ceremonies as simple and inexpensive as possible.

When Catholics enter church, Rich and Poor are on a level.

When Protestants come into their sick rooms, and burial grounds — let them then, if nowhere else, be on a dead level Quaker equality.

THE following address was recently delivered at the funeral of a San Francisco type-setter: "Our brother, Mr. John Harlan, is dead. His last letter is distributed, his case is emptied, his stick is full, the last line is spaced out, and the clicking of the type is no more heard as stuck by his hand. A paragraph is made, a period put in, his last proof is taken, his galley cleared. His form is made up, and lies upon the cold imposing stone of death, silent, lifeless. His faults are set in diamond and pined, so that no more proof can be taken. His virtues are set in six-line pica, colored, framed and hung on the walls of memory, never to be forgotten. Be warned and be ready. Correct your proof."

SPIRITUALISTS.

—o—

SPIRITUALISTS are developing spiritual science, while Shakers are making it practical by putting it to its proper uses.

Spiritual movements, like stars in the firmament, have their risings and their settings—their voices of promise and their frequent failures, in both letter and spirit. The barren fig-tree, after having been duly digged about, yet found fruitless, was hewn down and “cast into the fire”—the fire of judgment. Has the spiritualism, brought into public recognition nearly thirty years since, at Hydesville, New York, met the expectations of its friends? Are the devotees of Spiritualism purer, better, nobler than other people? Are they more honest, temperate, forgiving, benevolent, and self-sacrificing than other Protestant denominations? Our visionists prophesied of, and saw the workings of Spiritualism more than thirty years ago. The phenomena, as facts, are not new. The “gifts,” in some form, have always been in the world, and probably ever will be, as witnesses of a future existence. But so far as resulting in any organization, or any general concert of action for propagandism, for harmonizing the elements—for religious improvement, or benevolent purposes—it has proved a failure. Though an angel of light having “great power,” it has not proved itself an angel of salvation. Spiritualists, with whom we converse, do not profess to be saved, nor to walk in the newness of the resurrection.

Disintegrated and divided, as their publications testify, they cry: “Lo, here!” with V. Woodhull; “Lo, there!” with A. J. Davis; or “Lo,” in some other direction, “is Christ.” Professing to have no leaders, they are all leaders, clawing into each other like crabs in a bag. Surely, as words have meaning, this is Babel! While Spiritualism, as a science, is true, Spiritualists have not met our expectations. They are not progressive. They continue in their bad habits. They love the fashionable, the riches, and the pride of the world. They “marry and are given in marriage.” They fight, and, in many other ways, prove themselves anti-Christian.

Mediums in cities are numerous; but to identify the “familiar spirits” communicating through them is next to impossible. To “try” such spirits is like trying the case of Beecher and Tilton. Obsessions are common. Some of this class have come to us to be “restored to their right mind.” The materializations that we witnessed a few months since at the Eddys were genuine; and yet these materializing spirits, with few exceptions, are from the lower spheres. They do good in so far as they prove a future life. Spiritually, however, they are as children. Imposters, according to the Spiritualist journals, are numerous, while disorderly circles and an irreligious spirit prevail extensively. If some get rich through clairvoyance, their riches often take wings. Selfishness is the sin that so easily besets. Private property is neither Christian nor apostolic. Most of the best Spiritualists, so we are informed, attend “liberal Christian denominations,” and financially support them. Many of the oldest lecturers upon Spiritualism, such as J. M. Spear, Joel Tiffany, A. E. Newton, S. J. Finney, T. L. Harris, T. G. Foster, S. B. Britton, Emma Hardinge Britton, and others, do not now speak in public. Andrew Jackson Davis neither lectures, attends lectures upon Spiritualism, nor the sessions of the children’s lyceums. So we are informed by a prominent New York Spiritualist. And then, where are Charles Partridge, Dr. Gray, and others whom we used to meet in the New York conferences twenty and twenty-five years since? What does all this mean? Are Spiritualists satisfied with themselves? Satisfied with the lives they live in a selfish, wrangling, competitive, fighting, speculating world of monopolies and legislative rings, with the rich growing richer and the poor, poorer? My friend, the late Horace Greeley, once asked how long it “would take to heat an oven with snow-balls.” And, I ask, how long will it take Spiritualists to reform the world while they continue in the fashionable and evil practices of the world? In Bible times, the angelic voice was, “Come ye out from among them.” This is now the voice of the Christ-spirit to Spiritualists.

We have taken the ground all along that Spiritualism was a science; and, being a science, lacking the religious element; lacking the gathering, the harmonizing Christ principles of purity, consecration, and unselfish love, it would necessarily degenerate into sharp individualisms, the “lusts of the flesh,” the “pride of life,” and the vain practices of the world.

When friend J. H. Harter, a Spiritualist preacher of Auburn, visited us, telling his trials among “false brethren,” and with unworthy clergymen, we could only say—while deeply sympathizing with him—that those who choose to stay in the world must expect to be partakers of the world’s tribulations. “I am not of the world,” said Jesus. And being not of the world, he had a “bread to eat that the world knew not of.” Many Spiritualists—excellent people after the world’s model—as well as many in the Protestant churches, are inquiring their way toward Shakerism—the church of the second coming—the pentecostal church, based upon the Christ-principles of purity of life, peace, and “all things in common.” We are pleased to know this. The Spirit and the Bride say, come; come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest—the “rest that remaineth for the people of God.”

VISITORS.

—o—

RECENTLY, we have had Robert Cooper, an English traveler, who had spent two weeks at the Eddys’, as a scientific investigator of the supermundane phenomena occurring in their presence. His experience and observations are given at great length, and in minute detail, in the “Religio-Philosophical Journal.” His conclusion is, that no person, of sound mind, unbiased by preconceived opinion, or partisan motives, can visit the Eddys, remain a reasonable time, and come away other than a settled believer that spirits of men, women and children of different ages, size, weight and general contour of face and body, and of various nationalities, do appear as tangible materializations; that they talk, dance, sing, lecture, prophesy and give tests, by knowledge of facts respecting the history and domestic relations of the spectators, that dispel from their minds all doubts of the supernatural origin and character of the manifestations.

Robert Cooper is a cautious, cool, philosophical, conservative Englishman. He is a witness, whose testimony would be taken in any Court of Law.

J. J. Morse is a trance medium, on a lecturing tour through the United States, and is also a believer in “Materialization.” Subjoined are a few lines of poetry of which he was the ostensible author.

The Editor of the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS became acquainted with both of these friends in London, and was pleased to meet them again in the New World.

“I MAY NOT BE A PROPHET.”

I may not be a prophet; but methinks I feel the time
When freedom’s breath shall fan the cheeks of all
in every clime;
When labor shall be virtue, and religion shall be truth,
And all earth’s sons and daughters shall enjoy a lasting youth!

I may not be a prophet; but is not the era near,
When the Church will cease to rule men through dogma, creed, or fear?
When human life and Nature’s laws, in harmony entwined,
Will be the base of better lives, the Christ of all mankind?

I may not be a prophet; yet soon will dawn the day
When science and religion will the highest truths display;
The voice of each, eternal, shall resound throughout the land,
A system then, for head and heart, will reign on every hand.

I may not be a prophet; but the time is almost here
When the woman with the man shall stand and take her proper sphere.
Restricted and confined she’s been, in all the ages past;
Thank God! those states are almost dead—she will be free at last.

I may not be a prophet; yet how soon may it arrive—
That epoch in the world's career when love for rule shall strive;
The birth of peace, the death of war, the silencing of gun,
The prize of peace we're striving for will then be nobly won.

I may not be a prophet; yet the fabled time's at hand
In which the nations shall combine as one united band.
That day will see one God, one Church, one government on earth,
The long expected golden age, the truer second birth.

I may not be a prophet; but methinks I feel the time
When freedom's breath shall fan the cheeks of all
In every clime;
When labor shall be virtue, and religion shall be truth,
And all earth's sons and daughters enjoy a lasting
youth!

MOSES AND JESUS.

—O—

It was one of the ambitions of our childhood to become wise enough to know how Moses, through the "law," was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ." We think we have learned the lesson, at the expense of much damage to our early religious education. It is conceded that general Christendom despise the Israelites—despise is a feeble word to express the feelings of many, who think they are pretty good Christians.—It is common to hear them terribly traduced; and they must, apparently, forever, suffer the unequalled ignominy of killing the Lord Jesus! Were I a Christian, after the heart of the so-called, popular, Christian Churches, I would thank the Jews as a nation, and bless those who were conspicuous actors at the scene of Golgotha; for have they not given to these Churches the blood of Calvary, that they so fondly anticipate will be an atonement for the sins of their miserable, sinning adherents?

The very common Sunday School impressions made on minds in the moulding state, are, many times and in many directions, erroneous, cruel, wicked.

By these we learned that the Jews were and are a wicked, God-forsaken people—the very antipodes of true Christians; and that, after the appearance of Jesus, the Mosaic statutes became of no effect—a worse than worthless instrument.

As a consequence of such teachings, tens of thousands of us became imbued with the idea that Jesus was not a Jew, but a born Christian! that he did not like the Jews; that he taught doctrines, not only superior to, but the very reverse of those taught by Moses; and by his teaching and example, his immediate disciples, and all who shall succeed them, were prompted to discard and condemn the institutions of the great law-giver—Moses. These are terrible wrongs, committed in the past, continued in the present, and for their correction, we ask a hearing while we cry "Halt!" to their continued diffusion. I cannot conceive that doing Moses justice would be any detractor of Jesus; and yet we will compare some of his sublime sayings with the same of Israel's prophets, and if they prove identical, or nearly so, to whom shall we give the credit—Israel or Jesus? That Jesus was a Jew, and did not assume his Christos or Anointing, until he was thirty years of age, is too palpable to need proof, except with the very ignorant. That he read the law for years, in the synagogues of the Jews, and expounded upon with all the fascination of a brilliant, rising orthodox Rabbi, there is an abundance of proof in the gospels; and while not doubting his loyalty, the people wondered whence this young man had so much wisdom! His words breathed the inspiration and the expression of the great days of prophecy. Isaiah never commended the law, nor more faithfully followed it, than did Jesus of Nazareth. What could be stronger than "Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot, or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled?" Again, "Whoever therefore shall break one of these commandments, or teach men to do so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven." "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the influence of the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill." In these sayings did the Jews perceive renewed demonstrations of the permanence of the teachings of the great doctors of Israel; and they listened attentively to the new Rabbi, and everywhere greeted him with this revered title. In a former paper we have stated, that had not Moses taken the children of Israel out of Egypt, away from their bondage to physical and spiritual sins, we would never have had a Jesus! Herein is the key, how the law would teach us to come to Christ; even as in like manner it taught a people so to live, that from them was produced so beautiful a specimen of humanity as was Jesus—one in whom God's promise to Moses was fulfilled: "I will take all sickness from the midst of thee!"

Jesus kept the law, and, as a consequence, his health; and preached the gospel of health to his converts, teaching them, that by keeping the laws of Moses, they would be in a prime condition to receive Christianity. I know of nothing, that I think the spirit of Jesus has greater testimony against, to-day, than an unphysiological diet and practice of life. And yet, there are many that are ready to affirm, that Christ cares only for the soul. It is beyond the power of all Christs to resurrect the soul, while it is inhabiting a sickly, law-breaking body! Let Moses through the laws of health, be "the schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ." The baptism of Christ makes a reaper of a sower, teaches the superiority of the angel, celibate estate, over the reproductive plane—resurrects from the planting and sowing of the Adam, earthly to the harvesting, "cutting off from the earthly" condition, to be as was Jesus—Christ—a Shaker! Did Jesus ever teach adversely to Moses? Excepting a few instances, which shall be noticed, I am persuaded that none did Moses more honor through obedience than did Jesus; and none indorsed the renderings of the law, as given by the prophets, any more than did he. So fully in accord with them was he, that in his rebukes he followed in their footsteps, using almost identical language—(see Isa. I. II et seq., and 58, 3, and continue); and then we find, that for what we have been giving Jesus credit, as an originator, should have been more properly dated from the prophets. In the beautiful sermon on the Mount, who is there but thinks that such sentiments were never uttered before? Let us see: First, observe the scrupulous care with which Jesus connected this sermon with the whole of Judaism. Here comes in the already quoted remark, "I am not come to destroy the law;" and how frequently did he conclude, "That is the law and the prophets!" Let the curious Bible reader compare the following passages: Matt. 5:5 with Psa. 37:11; Matt. 6:15 with Cant. 28:3, etc. In Talmud Massechet Kalah may be found: "He who looks upon a woman with impure intention, has, it may be said, in so doing, committed adultery." Compare with Matt. 5:28. The principle of non-resistance inculcated by Jesus will be found in almost identical language in the lamentations of Jeremiah, even to "he giveth his cheek to be smitten;" compare also Matt. 5:44 with Lev. 19:17, 18; Ex. 23:4, 5; Ex. 23:17; and so on through all the principal sayings of Jesus. There is no remark in all the beautiful sermon on the Mount, that is so new, that its identity may not be found, in all richness in the older Bible or Talmud! The expressions, that often follow: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old," would almost lead us to think Jesus an innovator, rising in condemnation of the past; which so far from being true, in the apparent repetition of so-called statements, may rather be called a wholesale and indefensible calumny, which can be clearly proved! The rebukes which Jesus uttered to the people, find an equal in the prophets; and some of them sound like the reading of the latter, as in Isa. 1:11, et seq. One subject of Jesus was particularly odious to Jews—his professed divinity.

For this they killed him, after giving him ample time to save himself if he was divine. Not being a believer in the Atonement, I am most sorrowful that Jesus was not left to die naturally; when, I believe, the Jews would have better understood him. By this provision, also, we might have been spared the demoralization of Scripture as introduced by Paul, and learned by happy experience that Moses, through the law, is yet "our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ," even as he so schooled Jesus.

CORRESPONDENCE.

—O—

EXTRACT of a letter from Wm. Wheeler, dated Hebron, Ind., June 23, 1875, to Elder J. S. Prescott, of North Union, Ohio.

"Please tell me if you believe in the Bible alone as the perfect rule and guide to heaven and eternal life? And also, will the 'SHAKER AND SHAKERESS' allow our brief correspondence to be inserted in it?"

Please let me know. I hope to hear from you again soon. We join in sending our best love and wishes to all. I must say I have particular regards for you and yours. Hoping all for the best,

Wm. Wheeler, P. O. Box 38."

REPLY.

NORTH UNION, O., June 28, 1875.

WM. WHEELER,

Dear Friend—Yours of the 23d inst. is received. We are not in favor of theological discussions. If truth be the object, there is a better way to obtain it. It is well known that we do not believe in the plenary inspiration of the Bible as being the only "perfect rule and guide to heaven and eternal life."

We believe that some parts of the old and new Testaments were given by holy men of God, who wrote and spake as they were moved by Holy Spirits, the same as some do in this day. The Bible of to-day, the day and age in which we live, is as much an infallible guide to heaven and eternal life as the Bible of two thousand years ago, and more reliable, because it has never been corrupted by translators.

We believe that other parts of the Bible contain discrepancies and contradictions—words of wicked men and lying spirits, the same as are ministering in this day. It is generally admitted, and that too by some of the greatest sticklers of Bible infallibility, that some parts of the old Testament are too obscene to be read before a public audience or a promiscuous assembly.

And some parts of the Bible are simply historical, and no more the "word of God" than the history of Rome or of the American rebellion. And yet it is all summed up as the only infallible word of God. What an absurdity!

"All scripture given by inspiration of God, whether ancient or modern, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect—thoroughly furnished unto all good works." 2d Timothy, 3d, 16, 17.

The design of all scripture, given by inspiration of God, both Jewish and Christian, was the perfecting of the saints, the man and woman of God, that they might be thoroughly furnished unto all good works. But how have these scriptures been perverted to sectarian purposes even unto the present day?

Hence the necessity of a "more sure word of prophecy"—"present Revelation"—whereunto we do well to take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place." We are aware of the powerful organization now forming to get the Protestant Bible, with all its imperfections, engrafted into the Constitution of the United States.

And what is all this for? Is it to give these anti-christian Priestly bigots a chance to burn heretics and all who will not subscribe to their religious dogmas? May Heaven save us from such a back-set into the dark ages, is the prayer of thy friend

Jas. S. Prescott.

RETALIATION. Never retaliate nor seek revenge for real or supposed wrongs. By rendering good for evil, we not only disarm our enemies, but oftentimes make them our truest friends.

THE BRIGHT SIDE.

MAN'S free agency allows him to view, either the bright, or dark side of life. Unrestrained by the invisible powers, his aspirations produce the "conditions" which attract his proper spirit guides. If he court a cheerful disposition, with pure and holy thought, the bright angels are his guides and constant companions. Consequently he perceives the bright side of every thing and becomes a "bright and shining light." To those in the "slough of despond" a beacon to guide them to higher and firmer ground.

Imagination is the chief agent for producing dark forebodings in the human mind, which are usually followed by disease and premature death. The fact that Shakers, who love light, rather than darkness, and numerically considered in proportion to the masses of the generative world, retain their physical life and vigor much longer than their neighbors of the natural order, is due, in a great measure, to an unclouded conscience, and the dismissal of imaginary condemnations from their minds. It is recorded, that one of the primitive apostles of the Christ order, said, "From whence come wars," etc. "Is it not from the lust which is in your members?" It matters little with us, however, whether these words were uttered by apostle or apostate. We know it is the truth. When lust is conceived in the members, we soon become discontented with our surroundings, the life of purity becomes a grievous cross, the wheels of progression are clogged, retrogression follows, darkness begins to obscure our spiritual vision and our last state is worse than our first. When the unregenerated, in or out of Zion, are in the light, they perceive it not. "Having eyes, they see not." Physical death is their "king of terrors" and they have no victory over the grave. Community order, on the basis of celibacy and progress, is the consummation of the "Kingdom of Heaven," to every truly regenerated soul. God's children are all equal "on change"—priest, prophet and king—for all, who put on Christ, become priests and kings unto righteousness. Speaking of communism in the Boston Christian Era of March 18, 1875, says: "As a means for securing a comfortable animal existence these communistic systems are successful. As aids for the developments of the spiritual and intellectual life they are failures . . . they are of the earth, earthy. It is not from these that the social and industrial redemption of the world will come forth." Leaving out the class of communists that are of the "earth, earthy," I think our friend, by careful investigation, will find the average intellectuality and spiritual developments of the Shaker fraternity on par, if not a little above, the masses of the private family order. As to the redemption of the world, in the generative point of view, the Shakers spare no pains within their power, to endeavor to elevate the sons of Adam to the standard of true humanity—righteous generation—but it should be remembered that this is a deed of charity on their part, for the general good of the human race, as their work is of an entirely different nature, viz.: Regeneration. Does it become those who profess to "love the ways of Jesus," to condemn the institutions of those who both love and follow his ways and receive unto their homes and hearts every truly sin-sick soul who flees from mystical and false theologies of Babylon, aiding them by example as well as precept "to rise to joys of the Angelic birth?"

For nearly twenty centuries the earth order have been looking for the redemption of the world, through the "blood" instead of the life of Jesus. "New lights" have and are constantly rising upon the horizon of their troubled sea, only to be dimmed by newer rivals. But the "age of reason," which is fast dawning, teaches them that nothing is of value, unless it can be practically applied, that the zenith of human redemption can be attained only by a practical application of the doctrines set forth in the earth life of Jesus, who became the first fruits of purity through the spontaneous baptism of the Christ-Spirit. He rose from the sin-beclouded spheres of lustful generation, into the bright spheres of eternal purity, and became the then "only Son of God," with power to confer the same honor upon his followers, through all time, by owning them as brethren and sisters and "sons and daughters" of "our father and mother—God." Have we not then the bright side for our portion? Can there be any dark side with the "redeemed of earth?" Then let

"Storms of woe and whirlwinds rise,
Each cord on earth to sever,
There bright and joyous are the skies
There is our home for ever."

On the bright side.

ADULTERATED CANDY.

A LATE writer on the subject insists that candy is injurious, not only to the teeth, but the stomach, and hence to the health of children and adults. The oils and acids used in flavoring are particularly dangerous. He says the jargonelle pear flavor is made of the acetate of amylic ether, which is prepared by distilling a mixture of fusil oil, acetate of potash and concentrated sulphuric acid. The pineapple is made from butyric ether dissolved in another portion of alcohol. Butyric acid is made from decaying cheese, grape sugar and chalk, fermented together. Various mixtures of the ethers, with the addition of various agents, such as acetic acid, camphor, orris, vanilla, the volatile oils, etc., result in imitations of strawberry, raspberry, apricot, currant, etc. The tonka bean is used very much in place of the vanilla pod, to imitate the vanilla flavor. The common oil of almond (bitter) always contains a considerable amount of prussic acid. This oil is said to be substituted sometimes by the oil of mirbane or nitro-benzole, eight or nine drops of which is said to have produced death. The peach and almond flavors are also imitations, made from prussic acid in some form, and are very poisonous.

BUCKLAND, MASS., July 4, 1875.

MY DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

I have been re-reading all those beautiful and God-like utterances of the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS.

Truly, if ever divinity shaped mortal aims and purposes, and clothed in spirit dress and power, the thoughts and words of mortal men and women, it has been done in the productions of this blessed paper.

I think I see clearly a special new spiritual and physical revelation of divine love and mercy to the race of man, in the inception and active promulgation of the principles underlying the economy and faith of the Shaker system.

Looking over the declaration of principles and the holy life and simple purity exhibited in the whole system of Shaker life, I feel constrained to exclaim Eureka! the remedy is found. I think Shakerism the only remedy for the miseries, political, moral and theological, of the race. I think the solution of the perplexing labor question can be found in the Shaker community system only. I see clearly that the only certain antidote for the moral pestilence, the social evil, is seen in Shaker celibacy.

The cure for financial ruin and distress can be found in the Shaker simplicity of dress and life.

I fully realize that the restoration of humanity to the blessings of full physical health and a development of full physical beauty and moral and mental force, can be reached by a strict adherence to the Shaker system of food and labor.

In short, I am fully convinced that if men learn war no more, beat their swords into plow-shares, if the lion in humanity lie down with the lamb, it must be done in and through a channel precisely like the life of the disciples of Ann Lee.

Your brother for truth, humanity, for God,
William Alcott.

MOTHER SHIPTON'S PROPHECY.

EVERY now and then, for these four hundred years and more, some one has brought to light the prophecy and memory of Mother Shipton. An event follows event in mechanical progress, her doggerel verses fall in so pat that they must needs be quoted. One of the predictions thereof—"Fire and water shall wonders do"—has come to pass time and again, and the latest fulfillment is the Keely motor. This Mother Shipton was one that would have taken high rank as a medium in our day; in hers, the fifteenth century, she was said to have been begotten, like the wizard Merlin, of the phantasm of Apollo, or some arial demon under that guise, and a beautiful orphan Yorkshire girl named Agatha. She had the weird lonely girlhood that the child of shame is apt to have, avoided or persecuted by those who should have been her mates. She was christened Ursula by the Abbot of Beverly, and grew up so eccentric and unnaturally shrewd that by and by this tradition, in those superstitious days, grew about her birth. She prophesied as she grew older, and even "persons of quality" consulted her. She told the great Wolsey that he should never come to York, and, indeed, when within eight miles of it, he was arrested by Northumberland, at King Henry's order, and brought to Leicester, where he died. Also, she is said to have foretold the great fire of London, the execution of Charles I, and many notable events, besides of the Reformation and the reigns of Elizabeth and James. At the age of seventy-three she foretold her death, and at the hour predicted she died. Her name is a popular tradition in Yorkshire even to-day, and the tradition is founded in part upon fact. Her famous prophecy was said to have been published in her life-time, and again two hundred years ago, for we have seen it in a book of that time, where it was said to be copied from an older book. Though most of the items are vague enough, some show a marked coincidence with remarkable events, such as the invention of steam, railway locomotives and tunnels, the telegraph, iron-clads, and the admission of Jews into Parliament (in 1858). Without further preface, these are the elegant lines:

Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe;
Around the world thoughts shall fly
In the twinkling of an eye.
Water shall yet more wonders do,
Now strange, but yet they shall be true;
The world upside down shall be,
And gold be found at the root of a tree;
Through hills man shall ride,
And horse nor ass be at his side;
Under water men shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk;
In the air shall men be seen,
In white, in black, in green;
Iron in the water shall float
As easy as a wooden boat;
Gold shall be found and shown
In land that's not now known;
Fire and water shall wonders do;
England shall at last admit a Jew;
The world to an end shall come
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

REFORM.

ON the first day of April, 1872, there were four brethren in the Canaan Upper Family who used tobacco. Now there are none. The reform came in this manner:

One day, Elder Frederick called at our house and asked to see those four brethren. After we were seated, he began to talk about tobacco, and called it some hard names, which, though true enough, we did not all of us like to hear. But, as long as he generalized and confined his remarks to tobacco alone, we did not feel much disturbed. It was soon evident, however, he now meant something more.

He had come bearing a proposition, sanctioned by the ministry, that all the brethren in our little group who used tobacco should now quit it. This was a "hard saying, who could bear it?" "I'll quit it," said the eldest of the four; and he has kept his promise to this day. Another argued stoutly for his quid, as if it were a good thing; but finally came up to the help of the Lord against the nauseous weed, and like a good Believer, determined to conquer or die. He, too, has kept his resolution, and a short time since handed me two large plugs of navy tobacco, saying with a pleasant smile on his face, "I have not put a bit of tobacco into my mouth from that day to this, nor shall I, as long as I live."

The other two also took sharp hold of the proposition and are steadfast.

January 1, 1874, there were four brethren of our small group, of about thirty souls, who ate animal food. Now there is but one.

We have used in the past year 1,500 pounds unbolted wheat meal; 1,400 pounds unbolted corn meal; 800 pounds of oatmeal.

THE HARVEST PERIOD.

THE millennial age, or thousand years' reign of the saints, upon earth, with Christ, is the harvest age of the race, in which time, be it longer or shorter, the Everlasting Gospel will be preached to every creature, and all souls will enter the judgment—a new probation for their final order. It is the transition period of the race, from their natural life, to the spiritual. It is the disciplinary stage, for the final REST—the glorified state of all who receive the merciful offer of Christ, in his anointed messengers, and volunteer to follow his self-denying footsteps, to life everlasting. Its duration may vary from 7 to 70 or 100 years, according to diligence and faithfulness, after the work is begun.

These messengers, or rulers—for they sit upon Thrones of Judgment, and reign with Christ—are beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and the word of God. This signifies, they have ceased to follow the lead of their own self-will and wisdom—the head of the earthly man—and have submitted their necks to the Gospel yoke, whereby Christ has become their head. They are slain to the worldly, or selfish life, by the cross of Christ, and by the sharp sword of the word of God, sitting upon purified human tabernacles, likened to white horses. Their carnal pleasures, likened to flesh, from whence they arise, are given to the fowls of the air and beasts of the desert, to whom they properly belong. Thus they are put to death, flesh-wise, and quickened spirit-wise, and bear witness for the Truth, as Jesus did, by dying as he died, to a self-pleasing life, and living as he lived, a life of Righteousness—daily rising from the dead, by walking in newness of life.

BOLTED SUPERFINE FLOUR VS. TEETH.

BY EPHRAIM CUTTER, M. D.

THERE is no doubt that the decay of teeth prevails to an alarming extent, and it is very humiliating to our modern civilization to have it characterized so generally by the occurrence of diseased teeth. The aetiology of this disease is a great, broad, and deep subject. No doubt many elements combine together to cause it; and the person who should positively announce a single agent would be dismissed as unworthy of attention. Still it is a matter worth discussing, and deserving the attention of the ablest minds. To ignore is not to arrest; hence we offer a few suggestions for consideration.

"The Chemical News ascribes the potato rot to a deficiency of lime and magnesia in the soil. Different observers state the percentage of magnesia in the ash of sound tubers at from five to ten per cent.; in the diseased tubers an analysis shows only 3.94 per cent. Analysis of sound tubers shows over five per cent. of lime, but in the ash of diseased tubers only 1.77 per cent. was found. A similar observation was made some years ago by Professor Thorpe, with regard to diseased and healthy orange-trees; in the former there was a deficiency of lime and magnesia."

According to these authorities, a deficiency of mineral salts in the vegetations named is supposed to be a sufficient cause for decay. Now it is an interesting question whether there is any article of food employed by mankind which is deficient in mineral matter. If so, then it should be made known to every family in the land.

Perhaps there is no article of food more generally consumed than flour, i. e., wheat flour. In the forms of bread, cakes, and pastry of all kinds, it enters into every house, and is universally used and regarded as the "staff of life."

Does flour possess a requisite amount of mineral matter?

To answer this question, Mr. Sharples, the well-known chemist, analyzed for me the "Peerless Flour." He found 0.55 per cent of mineral ash, a little over half of one per cent. He stated also that the proportion of ash in the whole grain varied from 1.65 to 2.50 per cent. So that the diminution of mineral food varies from two-thirds to four-fifths. In other words, by the use of flour mankind loses from two-thirds to four-fifths of the elements that go to make up teeth and bony structures. This statement deserves to be written in letters of gold over the door of every bakery and kitchen in the land.

Flour has been used for generations, and if we can rely upon Mr. Sharples' statement, mankind has all this while been deprived of the greater moiety of the mineral food that the Almighty intended it should have the benefit of. Is it not natural to expect that the bony structures should suffer from this great withdrawal? For it is a great withdrawal. Suppose that a water supply pipe should be cut off two-thirds to four-fifths, would not the supply be greatly diminished? Cut off the same quantity of time from the hours of daylight, would not our darkness be great? Take away two-thirds to four-fifths of our muscular food, would not a strong man become very weak? Cut off air to the same extent, would we not lose our breath? And why should the bony tissues not suffer in like manner when their food is withdrawn? I think they do. Perhaps a little evidence in the contrary direction may throw light upon this.

A dentist, whose name is well known, said that he filled some fourteen cavities in the teeth of his first-born child by the time he was four years of age. He put his family upon the use of the whole grains, and the next child had no retarded dentition, and not a decayed tooth up to the same age.

The same gentleman says that the teeth which decay are not compacted or knit together with the firmness of healthy teeth. There seems to be an arrest of perfect development. Though what can be more natural than to expect imperfect development and decay, when from two-thirds to four-fifths of the proper bone food is habitually withdrawn from an article of diet which is more largely used than any other?

How common it is to see infants not cutting any teeth at all, until they are twice as old as they ought to be. The good effect of the whole grain diet is shown in Dr. Harriman's second child, above alluded to. To be sure it is only one case, and must not be made too much of.

Now, what is to be done about it? Certainly, one man's dicta amount to but very little alone. What we need is evidence from others. Suppose every medical association of Massachusetts take up this matter, have analyses of flour made, try feeding mothers and children upon the whole grain of wheat meal, oat meal, corn meal, beans, etc., and suppose they all come to the same conclusion as the writer has done. Suppose they officially announce the result. Would it be long before the general public would heed the truth, and thousands of persons would rejoice in the possession of that priceless treasure, a set of perfect teeth?

NOTE.—Through the kindness of Mr. E. H. Davis, Superintendent of Public Schools in Woburn, Mass., the writer has been furnished with the following astounding statistics, embracing returns from several of the largest primary schools of Woburn, a fair representation of the prevalence of diseased teeth among children:

	No. of scholars.	With sound teeth.	Decayed.

Highland St. Primary...	71	25	46

EGOTISM.

WE, is the Community pronoun. It seldom offends the ear. We build the mill, and make the dam. We harvest the Broom corn, and our money is in the Bank. We bought that farm, and paid $200, for the sorrel horse. This is our house, and shop. We baked the bread, and made the dinner. Neither in, nor out, of community, is the ear offended by this use of pronouns.

Should we substitute I, for we, and my, for ours, we alter the case, and run the risk of offending the ear, if not more.

Some years ago, an aged man planted a nursery. When Budding and Grafting time came, he took, as assistant, a youth, who had been apprenticed to him, as Shoemaker. The youth became an adept, and the entire care of this branch of the business devolved on him. One day, the aged brother was in conversation, with another person, on the thriftiness and good order of the nursery. The youth, being within hearing, noticed that the aged brother invariably said my nursery—I grafted those apple trees—I budded those peach and quince trees. It was all I and mine—never a we, nor ours.

Some persons are, unfortunately, so developed in selfhood, that touch what they may—be connected with whom they will, they seem to think, the success—if success there be—was largely owing to their wisdom, skill and manoeuvring.

Few things fill sensitive minds with deeper regret, than the effort, some persons make, to trumpet their own fame. They may, in the main, have a fair record for just dealing, correct business habits and capacity; yet nothing whereof to be vain. Had they been content with the consciousness of having done their duty, they might have finished their mortal pilgrimage with good repute.

From the miserable, selfish I, mine, and me, Good Lord, deliver us.

We have been told, that in other worlds, man's employ will largely consist in praising God. But what time will Egotists find for such employ? Habits are stubborn things. His penchant for self glorification will go with him. Let us get out of our miserable selves, into community Heaven, and find an element in community praise.

In community life, it may not readily appear where praise, or blame belongs. Hence none should claim credit, largely, who are not willing to take their share of blame.

Of Josephine, it was said, She was the Power, behind the screen, that gave success to the Armies of France. Her Wisdom and Gentleness sustained the Empire. When they were withdrawn, the Empire fell—and great was the fall.

There are reasons for believing, that in Community life, the real worthies—the successful operators on the electric wires, who, by the force of their magnetism, give success to our efforts, are but little known. They council in secret, and point where Wisdom directs—where success will result. They weep over the failures and short-comings of Society—rejoice in the prosperity of all, and are content to suffer, if Society prospers. Are not these the Fathers and Mothers, around whom the sacred influences of our Gospel principles cluster, fathers and mothers whose unassuming, unobtrusive influence makes glad the Zion of God? And when the seekers of self praise are lost in forgetfulness, shall not these remain a blessing and a praise to our sacred cause?

William Reynolds, Union Village, O.

HOW TO BREAK OFF BAD HABITS.

UNDERSTAND the reason, and all the reasons, why the habit is injurious. Study the subject until there is no lingering doubt in your mind. Avoid the places, the persons and the thoughts that lead to the temptation. Frequent the places, associate with the persons, indulge in the thoughts that lead away from temptation. Keep busy; idleness is the strength of bad habits. Do not give up the struggle when you have broken your resolution once, twice—a thousand times. That only shows how much need there is for you to strive. When you have broken your resolution, just think the matter over, and endeavor to understand why it is you failed, so that you may be on your guard against a recurrence of the same circumstances. Do not think it is an easy thing that you have undertaken. It is a folly to expect to break off a bad habit in a day, which may have been gathering long years.

Goodness in childhood and youth is the beauty of old age.

Any system of theology that shocks the mind of a child is a false system.—Thomas Paine.

SHAKERESS.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

At no time during the Ministry of the Apostle Paul, was he more deeply imbued with the Christ-Spirit, or had a clearer perception of the duties of those who would live holily, than when he said "Be not conformed to, but be transformed from the world. Ye are the temple of the living God. What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? Come out from among them and be separate; touch, taste, and handle not the unclean things thereof, and I will receive you, and be a Father unto you. I beseech you by the mercies of the living God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, and acceptable unto Him, which is your reasonable service."

Have principles changed since that time? If a separation from the world, and a cross against the carnal mind were requisite to the attainment of a true Christian character in the days of Jesus and his apostles, why not at the present time?

The views, and teachings of the early Christians, have become antiquated; and the popular theologians of to-day, who are paid from five hundred to a hundred thousand dollars annually to preach smooth things, tell their hearers to go their way, "eat, drink and be merry;" they will not be brought to judgment for secret sins, nor be rewarded according to their works. If they will only believe on Jesus, he will be their sponsor and expiate their sins. They may continue to eat their own bread, live in worldly and carnal pleasure, "and wear their own apparel," if called by the Christian name. And the people, as with one voice, respond, "Give us more pleasure, and less of the cross of self-denial, and we will bestow honor, praise and riches upon our venerable Clergy, crown them with laurels while living, and decorate their graves with floral contributions."

The same spirit is seeking to find entrance, and rule in the Shaker Order. And a voice from without is constantly pleading with members of our institution, to "come down from the cross." It is said that we practice too much self-restraint—that the line of demarkation is too apparent—that in manners, in dress and life-practice we are too distinct from the world. They say, they like the Shakers, and if we would renounce some of the peculiarities, which make us singular and unpopular, then we could fraternize; and many people who are seeking a quiet home of rest, but cannot find it, would join our Community.

A dear sister of the Shaker fraternity, who has passed beyond four score years, sensibly, feeling the force of the worldly element, in different forms, striving to undermine and destroy the very foundations of the Church of Christ in this day, writes to me, confidentially, in regard to it. Her motherly and saintly spirit is pained at the apparent lack of faith in God, and the growing desire of a class who bear the name of Believers, for more present pleasure and enjoyment in worldly things, at the expense of their spiritual life, and soul's welfare. And I take the liberty, without her knowledge, to make some extracts, hoping to benefit a few, and not do harm to any.

When I meet a person, who has lived in the service of God as many years as our venerable sister has done, with mental power so clear and with spirit bright and inspirational. I am reminded of the saying of Christ, "I am the resurrection. He that liveth and believeth in Me, shall never die." Our sister has lived the Christ-life—done the works—and knows on whom she has believed.

We may be numerically weak, yet be strong in virtue and spiritual power, or vice versa. About the time of the recent revival in Plymouth Church, when over a hundred were added to that sanctuary in one day—majority females—a young woman was visiting in our family; and as she stood curling her hair in ringlets, at which she had been engaged a long time—she remarked, "I am going to join the Church next Sabbath." "For what purpose," inquired one of the sisters? "Is your motive to live more in conformity to Christ's teachings?" "Oh, no," she replied; "that time has passed by. No one is now expected to change their habits of life by joining the Church. I can get access to certain individuals, and enjoy their society better if I join the Church, than if I remain isolated from it;" intimating that it was more fashionable, and popular to be connected with some Church, than to remain outside. How many such Christians would it take to make one perfect heaven?

BELOVED ELDERESS ANTOINETTE:

I would not willingly trespass upon your time, but I wish to unfold some of my thoughts, and disburden my mind to you. I feel that I am committing myself to a faithful friend, unto whom I may speak confidentially. The importance of the subject that I would portray, so impresses me, that I feel impelled to write to you. I realize that my mental and physical powers are waning, and my best efforts are somewhat feeble.

I perceive, in a certain class of professed Believers, a great lack of Faith and Spirituality; and such are fearful that the work of God in the Millennial Order is dying out; because there are not greater accessions to our ranks. I cannot view the subject in that light. I see the Sun rising, higher and higher in the spiritual horizon, as the day advances. The increase of truth does not depend upon numbers. I am confident that many of the more spiritual and enlightened class in society are now looking toward Zion for something higher and better than what they have yet attained. Let her inhabitants keep the love-fires constantly burning on her altars; and many truth-lovers, and truth-seekers, will see the light, and be attracted to her Courts.

As a senior member of the household of faith, in this day of Christ's Second Appearing, I feel to ask in a spirit of kindness and sisterly love, that all would strive to maintain true Christ-like forbearance and consideration; that the bond of peace may remain unbroken, and the unity of the spirit be preserved in this time of conflicting opinions. It is noble, and praiseworthy, to seek for new and increasing light; but it is unwise to let different views of minor importance hinder the full flow of pure love from circulating through all the members of the body.

New developments, in religion and science, should be met by calm investigation instead of opposition and persecution. As far as I have obeyed the injunction—"Try the Spirit"—making due allowance for crudeness and error,—which always attend the evolving process of newly revealed truth—I have found safety. It is wise to look at principles—to trace things to their source—thence to their ultimates as far as possible. Then reason, if not perverted, will aid us in arriving at just conclusions.

Truth will ultimately gather all its subjects into one spirit, and God's people will see eye to eye in all things; but it will be a work of time. We need patience, even as the husbandman, when he has deposited the precious wheat in the soil, awaits its growth and maturity before it can be harvested; and then, it must pass through the process of threshing, cleansing and grinding, to make it ready for use. So must we work, wait and trust, for the growth and unfolding of new and advancing truths.

Not hearers of the word only, but doers of the work, will grow into a knowledge of true doctrine—be able to understand the will of God and to do it—for through patience they will prove all things and hold fast the true and good. If there be a division in sentiment, the enemy has the vantage ground and will work to hinder a spiritual harvest, which may be nearer than many now anticipate.

According to both ancient and modern prophecy, the Law will go forth, from Zion, to earth's inhabitants. There is a constant draught from without upon the strength and vitality of our institution, which few seem to realize; but it causes spiritual debility and the members feel that strength and life go from them,—as did Jesus when the woman touched the hem of his garment,—even if they do not know where it goes.

Believers sympathize with, and contribute to the support of all true reforms; but in so doing we need unremitting energy to keep a separation from foreign, worldly influences, that would serve to divide and dismember, or cause dissension in any way. O how much we need to watch, and to pray, that Angels, from high and holy spheres, may guide and keep us!

As I near the change that I feel is coming upon me, I frequently review my life, from childhood to the present time; and as I read the pages of my life-history—the spiritual losses and gains—all the awakenings of conscience that I have experienced, which have brought me to feel deep tribulation and Godly sorrow, and to utter strong cries to God for greater self-conquering power, have helped me to quicken my pace for heaven, made my spirit more vigorous and active, and have filled my soul with peace.

I do not wish to leave this world in a state of stupor, from which it will take a long time to emerge. It is my earnest desire to go to my home and friends in spirit spheres, living and growing; that I may commence my work there, just where I leave it here. I have not attained unto the present state of peace and justification, which I now feel, by blending and uniting with the spirit and practice of the world. I wish to give my testimony in favor of a pure consecrated life, and of non-conformity to the world, in dress, or manners. My spirit is in unison with the founders of our Order. They strictly enjoined self-denial and crucifixion of the carnal mind and all inferior loves.

It is claimed, by some, that if we would increase in numbers, we must conform more to the people of the world, in manners, and in habits of life. What has been our experience in this regard, where the experiment has been tried? Where concessions have been made, have our numbers been increased, or diminished thereby? Or, has the power that is effectual in protecting souls from sin, been strengthened, or weakened? Justice demands, that we look at things just as they are; and then decide, whether it be a real desire to help lift humanity to higher and better conditions that induce to action, or the pleadings of the worldly nature within our own hearts, that seeks gratification, and goes forth to meet the spirit of the world without, that would allure, and draw souls away from the pure virgin life.

The greatest ingathering to Christ's fold, that I have ever witnessed, was at a time, when there was the most exclusion from without, and the strongest and most searching testimony, within our own courts, against all sin-producing causes. While a separation from the world is necessary to maintain the Christian life and character, it is our duty to treat all with kindness and respect, and to be ready to give to all a reason for our hope of eternal life, and to present the cross of Christ by which we are redeemed unto God.

In conclusion let me say, the "SHAKER AND SHAKERESS" is a real treat to me; and I know very few in Harvard, Shirley, or elsewhere, who could bear the idea of having the paper discontinued. We hail its monthly arrival with joy; it seems so much like having a sweet visit with our dear Gospel friends at the Mount, and in other societies. I hope nothing will occur to render it necessary to discontinue it.

We recently had a brief, but very pleasing and instructive interview with Elder Frederick. It was soul-cheering to witness the true Christ-like spirit that he manifested on all occasions while with us.

I suppose you are nearing the time of your annual "Social Gathering." How delighted I should be, to be present, and participate with you. That Heaven's blessing may ever attend those meetings, is the prayer of your aged friend and sister.

Eunice Bathrick (aged 84), Ayer, Mass.

THE following communication is from a Shaker Sister, eighty-five years of age.

Paul's exhortation to the Hebrews, "Seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight," etc., will apply with force, reason and profit, to Believers in our own time.

Another octogenarian speaks through our little Monthly. She has proved the efficacy of Gospel faith—reduced to practice—more than seventy years. Hear her: ED.

ELDERESS ANTOINETTE:

Dear Sister—I feel greatly interested in the SHAKER and SHAKERESS, and hail every new number with joy; would be pleased if it were a weekly issue instead of a monthly. Seeing many testimonies from brethren and sisters, that I love and prize for their work's sake, inspires me to briefly add mine.

While reading the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS I have been reminded of the flying roll seen by the Prophet Zachariah which was sent forth as an accuser through the land, condemning sin in every form. It is also a messenger of glad tidings to sorrow-stricken, sin-laden, repentant souls.

As I have nearly run my earthly race, I feel that a brief synopsis of my experience may be of some interest to the junior members of our society.

I was brought to Mt. Lebanon, and placed under the guardianship of Believers when I was eight years of age. My first baptism was a ministration of love, from my visible guides and protectors, which met a response from my own heart, and influenced my actions. As I advanced in years, and grew in stature, I found that I had a choice to make, between good and evil, which to serve. I read and believed the Scripture, which said, "To whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are," that by being made free from sin, we could become servants of righteousness. I saw, and felt, that doing what was just and right, would give peace of mind—cast out fear—and enable souls to serve and worship God in love. "Love would work no ill to its neighbor," and was really "the fulfilling of the Law." I resolved to make Love my axiom, and I felt my heart expand with love toward all the human family.

My faith in God, and in the Gospel of Christ through the order of male and female, increased. I believed "the pure in heart would see God," and be able to understand those things which pertain to His kingdom. I strove with all the strength of my mind, to be pure, and to keep myself unspotted from the sins of the world, to be meek—merciful—a peacemaker. Thus I progressed from faith to faith, and from strength to strength. And it is still my determination to keep in the increasing work, which I believe will grow brighter and brighter unto that perfect day, when every thought, word, and action, will be under control of the Christ-Spirit.

I have ever chosen to serve under the Christian banner, and have thereby been able to abstain from a sinful life. And I now rejoice that I can testify, to all who may feel an interest in me, or in my experience as a Believer in the work of Christ's Second Appearing, that I have so successfully fought the good fight of faith, when evil, in its varied forms, is presented, it finds no abiding place in me; and with many of my dear companions in Gospel travail, I can raise a shout of victory.

I would not exchange the peace and satisfaction that I feel, in my advanced stage of life—blessed, as I am by visible and invisible friends—for all that this world could give me. I am thankful to testify, that there is a fountain opened in Zion, wherein souls may wash and be made free from the stains of sin; and whosoever will may drink freely and live—live forever.

Lucy Hammond, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

GOOD WORKS.

Of what profit is faith unless it be made manifest by good works? Good words, when timely and fitly spoken, often give solace to the afflicted, and comfort the mourner; but to the naked and famishing, "Be ye warmed and clothed," in word only, would be of little account. By good works we not only "lay up treasure in heaven," but like Dorcas of old, confer benefits upon destitute humanity, and blessings return to us manifold.

We may be very correct in our faith, and love, admire and laud others, who show their faith by works, yet, if we lack the courage and energy to reduce our faith to practice, it would be as unavailing as implements in the hands of the husbandman who is too indolent to use them.

Deeds of charity toward individuals, and acts of kindness and generosity, attended with soft and gentle words that will prevent or turn away wrath in communities, would form a heaven on earth, and pure, peaceful spirits would delight to gather around and hold communion with such souls, for they are nearly allied to angels.

Ruth Webster, Union Village, O.

OUR GOSPEL PRECEPTORS.

WHY should we not love and revere the Ancients of Israel—our former Teachers—those Gamaliels, at whose feet we have sat and listened, and received much valuable instruction? They have been to us, spiritual Fathers and Mothers, Brothers and Sisters, and were bright examples while here. Their lives were well spent, they have passed on before us to the "summer land," and left behind them a record of good works.

True, many of those worthies drew spiritual life and sustenance, to a large degree, from the inspiration of the past, looked to types and symbols, and were somewhat veiled in mists and shadows. They were accustomed to accept and revere whatever they found between the lids of the Bible, without calling in question its consistency, or authenticity.

Now, the light of reason and Divine Revelation has opened, more clearly to our vision, the links of the great chain that unites natural and spiritual truth—conjoins Science and Religion. Will that justify us in setting at naught the righteous teachings of our Preceptors, or in discarding the good of the past? There have been good men, and women, in all ages, who were Saints. They were the salt of the earth; for they loved, honored and served God, according to their understanding, and made their mark for good to humanity. Gleanings of light overspread their spiritual horizon, and lighted their pathway; and, aided by Bible teachings, they lived righteously, in their day, and were accepted.

If, by increased light, we now see that they believed too much of Bible records, and accepted them altogether, without reasoning, and making due allowance for mediums, circumstances and conditions at the various periods when the Scriptures were written, and did not distinguish between fallacy and verity; it would seem unwise for the present generation, like the swing of a pendulum, to go to the other extreme, and become infidel in spirit, if not in profession, and reject the true as well as the false.

One thing we must concede, if honest; i. e., many worthy souls in the past, who adhered to, and trusted in, the Scriptures as their rule of faith possessed more vital religion, which consists in goodness of heart—purity of life—and a willingness to suffer, and to do, for truth's sake, than the rising generation who have cast off reverence for the past, and virtually deny present revelation, however much they may expatiate upon Truth, Reason, and Common Sense.

The goal of immortal happiness has been the highest aspiration of the enlightened portion of our race—the boon for which humanity has sighed, and for which Saints have suffered, and Martyrs yielded up their lives. Many have thus triumphed over death and the grave, and found a haven of rest.

But to those who at the present time denounce the Bible as a whole, and say that, as a sailing craft for the mariner on life's sea, it is no longer reliable—there are so many loose planks, it is better to abandon it altogether—we would suggest, whether it would not be better to cling to the old vessel, and to teach their children to believe the story concerning the bears that came from the wilderness, and devoured forty and two children, rather than have them grow up in a defiant, mocking spirit—destitute of the fear and love of God, or respectful regard for their fellows, and superiors. Is it not a safer way, to hold on to the good of the past, until we are sure that fate, destiny, inspiration, or whatever we choose to call it, gives us some better, more reliable plan, by which to obtain the one object in view—happiness?

Speaking from personal knowledge, I might be considered incompetent to judge; for I came among Believers at an early age, and have never passed the ordeal of orthodox Church discipline—Sabbath-school training—neither learned the Catechism, nor any creed; and have never committed any formal prayer to memory,—except what is known as the Lord's prayer. That prayer, I have always thought beautiful, expressive and impressive; and it never waxes old. I have been free to be my own Bible interpreter,—a privilege largely enjoyed by the members of our community.

To observation, and the experience of others, I owe what knowledge I possess of the present unsatisfied state of society without, and the increasing tendency to disregard all that was once deemed sacred. Elder Frederick Evans says, that when we advance into New Light, we are sure to take with us a portion of the old orthodoxy from which we emerge; that while new light is developing, the old conservative element, which has formerly environed us, is slowly removed. That seems to me a wise provision to avoid confusion and inharmonious.

In this age of free thought, free speech and action, there is great need of a fulcrum, whereon to rest the lever of Truth, that the religious world may move from its old foundations of error, without destroying its equilibrium, and tumbling it into worse confusion than ever.

I propose that firstly,—before throwing the old and new Scriptures away, and taking the ground that Jesus of Nazareth was a myth—we find the Christ-spirit, and the power of God unto salvation; and learn to reverence, and love all, who deny themselves of sinful works, live purely and deal justly, whether they be man, woman, or child. Let us all remember, that he, or she, who sins against light and conviction, if not of the devil, is not doing the will of our Father and Mother in heaven.

Anna Dodgson, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

DEAR EDITORS OF SHAKER AND SHAKERESS:

We offer a tribute of thanks for our monthly visitor, the S. and S. It is hailed with joy, and love greetings, every time it comes, and we invoke the blessing of heaven upon those who strive so much to make it interesting and instructive.

We need Saviors on Mt. Zion; those who are eagle-eyed—clear sighted—divinely inspired, and in rapport with spirit spheres. They will find the keys of revelation, that will unlock what have been called the "mysteries of godliness"—of religion—reconcile the past with the present, give confidence in the coming future, and show that Philosophy, Science and Religion are indissoluble friends, and will walk hand in hand together.

But the sword of truth, proceeding in love from the mouths of the Lord's prophets, will separate the false from the true; and we pray that the days of the ever faithful prophets, and prophetesses, that are now with us, may be lengthened. We also pray, that such greatly needed laborers and teachers may increase manifold.

Lovingly your sister,

Nancy Riley, West Pittsfield, Mass.

I LOVE to peruse the "S— and S—," and would signify my approval and appreciation of its contents. I feel deep interest in the welfare of humanity, and would rejoice in spirit to see them elevated to better conditions; to see them rise out of the sphere of self-serving and self-pleasing, and devote their time and talents upon the broad basis of universal love to God and mankind. Then justice would rule in the affairs of men.

Great reforms are needful; but where is the power to meet the present exigency? Men and women, unassisted by the grace of God, cannot effect the needed change; it must be wrought through faith and prayer, accompanied with good works.

Omnipotent Power must fathom man's loss, And teach him the glory of bearing the cross, Until from all sin he finds a release,

Enhancing his joy, and his blessing.
My sisters in suffering, I oft pray for you
That angels of mercy may guide you safe through,
Where together we'll meet on Canaan's bright shore,

A heaven of glory possessing.

Julia Scott, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

THE NEW JERUSALEM.

—O—

In the twenty-first chapter of Revelation, a City is described, as coming down from God, out of heaven; and a voice was heard, saying, "The tabernacle of God is with men." That city had twelve foundational stones—representing twelve fundamental principles, from which all the Christian virtues proceed—and which form the gates of entrance to that city, which was four square—equal in all its parts—and from which, every thing impure, or untrue, was excluded. The New Jerusalem, that descended from heaven to earth, did not require natural light, or heat, because God, who held the burning lamp of Truth—Divine revelation—lighted the whole city.

A pure River of water of life was also seen, proceeding from the throne of God, flowing through the city; and on either side of the river were trees of life. To my understanding, that river signified waters of judgment and repentance; through which souls must pass, to purify, and fit them to become indwellers in the temple, that was lighted with God's glory; and that judgment will be dispensed by, and through His witnessing saints, male and female, who were represented by the trees on either side of the river. They, as good and true physicians of souls, will distribute the medicinal leaves of those trees, which were to be "for the healing of the nations." And it is there stated that "The nations and kings of the earth would bring their glory, and honor unto that beautiful city and temple."

When Jesus said to his disciples, "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you," we would not suppose he meant to convey to their understanding, that previous to that time, there had been no place prepared in Spirit realms for saints of previous ages. There are heavens, and a heaven of heavens.

The antediluvians had their heaven, or state of justification; which consisted in obedience to natural and physical laws, as made known to them, by the ruling Spirits who were appointed to give them such lessons, as they were able to receive at that time.

In obedience, they were promised a fullness of temporal blessings. That was the highest attainment which they could appreciate; for they were in a crude, undeveloped condition. The highway of progression remained to be opened up, little by little, through succeeding epochs, in future generations.

The Jews had their heaven. The tutelage of the Jews was very superior, and in advance of that received by the antediluvians. Hence, the requirements upon them were greater. They had prophets and seers, who were blessed with rays of spiritual and divine light; and they caught glimpses of heavenly conditions in the distant future—of the more perfected mansion which Jesus referred to, when he said to his disciples, "I go to prepare a place for you, in my Father's house of many mansions."

There are different degrees of knowledge, and attainments in goodness and truth in each of those mansions; so that we might with propriety say, "there are mansions within mansions;" or there are ascending steps, like the rounds in a ladder, from the commencement of one dispensation, until, by those progressive steps, the way is prepared for the opening of a New Epoch.

A friend once said to me, "You know that in our Father's house are many mansions. I belong to one of the Churches,—one of those mansions—and am going to heaven," signifying, that the many Churches are the synonym of the many mansions of which Jesus spake. In a qualified sense that may be true. If God's watchful care be over all the works of his hands, and there be some truth, more or less, in all the Churches, mixed up with time serving, and idol worship, that good, whatever its measure or degree, belongs to God.

But the perfected Virgin Church—the New Jerusalem—that was seen to descend to earth, attended with the heavenly Bridegroom and Bride, wherein woman finds her proper lot and place, as co-worker with man in the redemption of human souls, is the highest spiritual condition on earth; and represents the heaven of heavens in the Spirit world.

Nancy G. Danford, Canterbury, N. H.

KNOW THYSELF.

—O—

In social life, and in all the relations that human beings hold to one another, how many ills would be averted and unpleasant feelings avoided, were that most excellent rule of serious second thought more frequently called into action.

A moment's consideration of consequences would often check a quick impulse, quell fevered passion, press the lips and put a bridle on the tongue, just in time to save a storm or tempest that might forever blight the loveliest blossoms of the soul.

A thoughtless act, a passing word, or a speaking glance—prompted by wrong motives—tell volumes that would remain forever closed, were the mind bent on obeying the golden rule.

It is a wicked heart that magnifies, intensifies, and glories in enlarging its neighbor's faults, while striving to conceal its own deformities. "Know Thyself," in a deeper meaning than that which is applied to the mental faculties, should be stamped on every mind; a meaning which penetrates the secret springs of life; "tries the heart and reins," and analyzes the motives which prompt to utterance, or to action.

They who have a thorough knowledge of themselves, and square their lives by the perfective spirit of Truth, nobly expand in God-like charity and love for humanity, and become saviors to souls, messengers of wisdom and light, rather than destroyers of virtue through evil judging.

Where vain arrogance and jealousy, bitter envy and poignant malice are harbored in the soul, peace departs, and the bliss of life is trampled in the very dust of earth. Friendship there finds no lasting hold; love is repulsed, and heaven-born charity spurned. Those direful enemies of human progress and happiness can only be removed from society by individual effort; every one must discover in themselves the root of bitterness, and destroy the very life that produces such evil fruit.

A profitable exercise of mind to be engaged in is discovering when and where we may make peace, and not break it. "Neither give nor take offense." Speak no ill of our neighbor, and turn from the hearing of slander; that will produce the desired effect. Words aptly spoken—kindly acts—loving smiles—and courteous manners, all conduce to happiness and peace. If we always apply the rule to consider well before we speak or act, we shall never fail to obey the promptings of the higher law of love.

"He who can command his own soul is the bravest of the brave," said Mohammed. Ah! this is life's great lesson. The strength of self-control is the secret power that is able to manacle the strongest opposing powers of good that take possession of the battle-ground of the soul, and let us attain it through the glorious cross of self-denial, that develops and unfolds the angel in our being, and annihilates its opposite. Then shall we be able to see the angel in others, however dimly it may manifest itself.

Martha J. Anderson, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

PEACE.

Pause, gentle angel, o'er us now,
And spread thy wings divine,
Let every heart in reverence bow
Before thy sacred shrine.
We'll bless thee ever, angel Peace,
With us, make thy abode,
To thee our love will never cease,
For thou art born of God.

Oft do we come to thee, fair one,
To seek thy heavenly aid;
Thy pearly gates to us unfold,
And glories that ne'er fade.
We'll praise thee ever, angel Peace,
For works, both great and good,
O may thy mission never cease,
Thou loved one of our God.

We grasp the wealth that will endure,
Such crowns as angels wear;
Immortal treasures, that are pure,
And joys the ransomed share.
We'll honor thee while here below
We tread this earthly sod;
All hail! sweet Peace—blest messenger—
Thou angel sent of God.

The angry waves upon life's sea,
At thy command are still;
The fiercest storms that there may be,
Are silenced by thy will.
O, heavenly Peace forever reign,
Thy influence spread abroad;
Till earth shall from thy spirit gain
The love and power of God.

Genevra De Graw, Sonjca, N. Y.

COMMUNE WITH NATURE.

—O—

Alone within the forest,
Fair nature's balmy bowers,
I hold commune with angels,
Expanding hidden powers.
Through birds and beauteous blossoms,
Am lifted far above,
To the elysian cities
Of God's eternal love.

I walk his golden temples
And glorious gardens fair,
Drink in at living fountains,
And eat of fruitage rare.
I list the holy anthems
Of souls redeemed from sin,
The radiant band of heroes,
Who fought, the race to win.

I see their whitened raiment,
The diadem and crown,
And in their foreheads written,
True victors of renown.
Who Jesus' cross have carried,
For love of truth and right,
And now with him are seated
In mansions of delight.

And then a precious healing
Calms every inner strife,
And all my heart is strengthened
To cope again with life.
Then soft and gentle whispers
Come stealing on the air,
And back my soul is bidden
To time, and toil, and care.

I take the heavy burden
And lay it next my heart,
With pledges unto heaven
To act the christian's part.
With faith in God's rich promise,
That in his own good time,
He'll crown me with these glories
In fairer worlds sublime.

Julia Johnson, W. Pittsfield, Mass.

How well to live and do no harm,
Though very little good we do;
How great the lesson yet to learn,
To be to others kind and true.
Snatched from the world, we know we are,
To find the holy, just and pure,
To calm the elements that jar,
And make a peace that will endure.

FOUNT OF LOVE.

CANAN, N. Y.

1. Up - lifted to the realms above, Through living faith and prayer, Our souls can reach the fount of love, And find a blessing there.
 2. Life's rugged pathway oft is drear, When sorrows deeply roll, And we would speak a word of cheer, To help each struggling soul;
 3. Oh, let our lives be ev - er rife With kindly love and peace! Through meekness banish every strife, And let all dis - cord cease;

Though tri - als oft the heart oppress, There is a heal - ing balm, A spir - it ev - er near to bless, And shield from every harm.
 Then like the bread so soft - en cast Up - on time's troubled sea, It will re - turn a - gain at last, With blessing pure and free.
 Then we may chant the conqueror's song, And tri - umph in the right, Give praise to whom all praise belongs, When faith has turned to sight.

SHAKER AND SHAKERESS.

—o—
NOT ALL A DREAM.

I dreamed of a flowing river,
 That was fed from mountain and plain,
 That came like a harvest gliver,
 To gardens, and fields of grain,
 Whatever it touched it brightened,
 For life was within its wave;
 Whatever it washed it whitened,
 For in it was power to save,
 But I dreamed that its waves, impeded,
 Shrank back to their little springs;
 And the tide that the great world needed,
 Was circling in hand-breadth rings.

I dreamed that the angels planted
 A vineyard of God, below;
 That unto the earth was granted
 The power to see it grow,
 That up from her barren places,
 Her desert's extended scope,
 Like music the echo chases,
 Came voices of joy and hope.
 But I dreamed that the vineyard perished,
 That all hut its roots were dead!
 For strength, that its life had cherished,
 Like dew of the morning fled.

And I dreamed of a holy altar,
 Where Truth had kindled a fire;
 A light for the feet that falter,
 A gleam for the eyes that tire.
 Its radiance flamed with a glory,
 The dwellings around to fill;
 And the earth was thrilled by the story,
 Of the city upon the hill.
 But I dreamed that the altar tumbled;
 That its glow became a spark;
 That its steps and its pillars crumbled,
 And its dwellings around were dark.

I dreamed a new song was started,
 That floated the wide world o'er;
 That brought to the weary-hearted
 A courage unknown before.
 'Twas the song of the Revelation,
 The song that the harpers sung;
 Its theme was the new salvation;
 Its words were the glad new tongue.
 But I dreamed that its numbers ended
 Ere their import half was told;
 That the singers from heights descended,
 And covered their harps of gold.

Yea, I dreamed that the dual token
 Of Zion, was lost to sight;
 And I wept, that a bond was broken,
 And quenched was a heavenly light.

Then I dreamed that our hearts, in union,
 Went out to the children of men—
 That the swell of our love's communion,
 The river sent forth again.
 By toil of our hands, united,
 The vineyard in beauty bloomed!
 Devotion and truth relighted
 The city, our home illumined!
 And the gift of deep inspiration,
 That flowed through Mount Zion's throng,
 Was heard by each listening nation,
 And known as the full new song.

Cecilia Devyr, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

SABBATH.

Turn from the outward leaf of life,
 And give the Sabbath place;
 Be earnest in the upward strife,
 Be thine the christian grace.
 A Sabbath is a day of rest,
 Not measured by a span,
 They who with gospel faith are blest,
 Have rest in God's own plan.

Each covenant the Saviour taught,
 Gives peace unmarred within,
 And forms a Sabbath, truly wrought,
 Out from a life of sin.
 Second to this, the work of hands,
 The toil on earthly sod;
 For when the truth our life commands,
 We've constant rest in God.

M. Whitcher, Canterbury, N. H.

THE POINT.

FACT, OR FRAUD—WHICH?

WHEN from five to twenty-five forms, of men, women and children, appear in an evening seance, on the platform of the Eddy Hall, in Chittenden, in presence of from twenty-five to fifty spectators, gathered from all parts of the Union, and some from foreign countries, one of two things occurs—either those forms are the product of downright fraud and lying trickery, and all these spectators—leading minds, from Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, London, Texas, Rhode Island and Mt. Lebanon—are imposed upon, deceived, deluded, bewitched, and made to think and know that they see, and hear uttered, high and noble sentiments touching the welfare of society, by the materialized spirits of men and women from the Spirit-World, when in reality it is only the Medium and his co-conspirators—or, a New Epoch has opened to mankind, that shall ultimate in the Kingdom of Heaven upon Earth, uniting God to Humanity, through the Law of Materialization and de-materializa-tion. Through its agency Angels will descend upon the sons and daughters of men, eliminating, from Humanity, evils, physical and spiritual—substituting in their place the virtues and graces of the Angelic hosts— the consummation of the ages, so long looked for—the Millennial Era.

CREED.

I BELIEVE in God, the Father and Mother, in whose likeness Man will be when they grow to it.

I believe in Jesus and Ann, and in all who, like them, do right because it is right, irrespective of cost.

I believe in the Communion of Saints, and in courtesy and kindness to Sinners.

I believe in the Resurrection of Body and Soul from unphysiological diet, habits and appetites—from low ambitions, carnal desires and misuse of reproductive powers—and from their use by such as aspire to Life Everlasting. Amen. O. P.

SPEAKING.—In speaking, the object is, to be heard and understood. Every speaker to public audience, whether few or many, should stand while speaking. To sit is disrespectful to the audience. Speakers in public should measure the magnitude of the room, and so pitch the voice that all may hear—should speak slowly and articulate clearly. If the hall echo, speak very slowly.

SWISS BURIALS.

—o—
A REBUKE OF THE PREVALENT AMERICAN FOLLY
IN FUNERALS.

IT is very doubtful how far in America would be willing to tolerate any invasion, by the government, of the inalienable right of the free citizen to run up a bill with his own favorite undertaker.
 But those who have seen as much as I have of the suffering which is sometimes produced in families of slender or even moderate means by the too unrestricted exercise of this liberty on the part of both the contracting parties, will feel that these Swiss republicans (who have, withal, the reputation of being reasonably jealous of their liberties) find some compensation in their hereditary bondage. I was surprised at the small amount of the bill which I was called upon to pay at the mairie of Petit Saconnex for the expenses of our modest funeral ceremonial. I could not help admiring the success with which the people here had protected themselves from the dilemma in which families of small means at home are often shut up—between a pauper funeral and a crippling debt to the undertaker. The evil cries out for a remedy. The Roman Catholic clergy have made honorable efforts to abate it among their flocks, and Bishop Coxé, of Buffalo, has done the little that can be done by remonstrance in his denomination. If a sumptuary law is ever needed, it is on this point.
 But a more hopeful prospect of success, considering the habits of our people, would be in the social combination of individuals and families, beginning with those of large means and unquestioned position, to discourage funeral extravagance. It would be a most Christian thing for rich and influential families to pledge themselves to stand by each other and by their neighbors in the practice of a severe simplicity and economy in such matters, and in providing a way in which funerals should be arranged in a modest but suitable manner, with absolute security against extortion.—
Lippincott for July.

A good point of practical reform. The Shaker funerals, for a century, have been simplicity, neatness and economy combined. The love, sympathy and respect of the survivors is directed toward the soul, just separated from earthly friends by the loss of the body, that has been hitherto the lifelong medium of communication between them; whilst the body is put in a plain board coffin, without paint or ornament, and is quietly dropped into the ground—the grave of forgetfulness.—Ed.

SECOND VISIT TO THE EDDYS.

IN company with two Sisters—representatives of their Order—we made, in July, a second visit to "Spirit Vale"—Chittenden, Vt. We were kindly received by the Eddys, by their visitors—some forty-five or fifty—and by the Spirits. We witnessed many materializations and communications of Spirits.

That the Mediums are true and honest in the part they act, was the general verdict of those present. There was one exception—a reporter of the Boston Herald—a young man, whose manner and bearing impressed all with whom he came in contact, as an entirely untrustworthy describer of any thing he might see, or hear, pertaining to Spiritualism. His report of the séances, each of which we witnessed, is untrue in fact and egregiously wrong in spirit.

And here I would make a few remarks upon unprincipled Journalism. Perhaps, I cannot better illustrate than by stating, that I, as Editor of the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS, am, from time to time, in receipt, from parties styling themselves "Publishing Bureaus." They offer to contract to furnish any quantity of matter, from one column, to a dozen, at a rate to be agreed upon. The matter to be in the form of letters or communications, and upon any subject designated. Any grade of theology, or shade of politics, that the Editor may desire, will be presented!!

It is a common practice, in our great cities, especially New York, for Editors to send Reporters to meetings, of different kinds, to write them up or down—to represent or misrepresent their sayings, and doings, just as the Journal inclines, for, or against the cause advocated, the principles enunciated, or the parties engaged. When I conversed with the Herald Reporter, I had no more doubt, than after reading his report, that he was hired and sent, by his employers, to denounce, ridicule and utterly condemn the Spirit Vale, or Eddy materializations, regardless of what might be the facts of the case. How far the poor young man is responsible for the consequences of his service to his employer, I leave an open question, of little moment.

But what of such Journalism?—Every new and true phase, of human progress, must pass through this trying ordeal. In the end, Truth triumphs—Error, alone, is slain by such weapons.

The Blood of Martyrs is the seed of the Church. By the sufferings of pioneers, the soil of freedom is cleared of the gigantic forests of evils, and opened to the Sun of Righteousness.

In St. Louis, Aug. 10.—W. C. Clark, Medium—Henry Twining paid fifty dollars for liberty to shoot a Materialized Spirit. The Medium directed by Mother Ann Lee to proceed to Mt. Lebanon. Letter and answer next number.

GHOSTLY STONE THROWING.

THE Albany Express, August 10, had an article concerning Ghosts. It states that in a neat little village in Michigan, called Byran, a family of the name of Turner are stoned by Ghosts. It commenced last fall, while the woman was milking, and is still in operation. Stones fell several days, puzzling all searchers and inquirers, "when the neighbors came, and the stones continued rapidly falling about them in their search for the person throwing them."—When the snow was deep the stones still kept falling.

"A thousand, or more, persons have visited the place, and all are convinced that there is a Ghost in the case."

Does the Express remember the Stratford, Ct., excitement, of some twenty years ago? Stratford was a beautiful little village, inhabited mostly by retired D. D.'s and their prosperous deacons. Their godliness had been profitable to them, in all things pertaining to this life and the world that now is; but it had not enlightened their understandings relative to the world "that is to come." They had taught the people to believe, devoutly, all the Bible marvels, as set forth in King James' translation—the Protestant word of God. Men carried, for miles, by Spirits, who held them by the hair of their heads. Through their agency, Women, past age, became happy mothers. They fed Elijah with food that lasted him forty days. At his word they improvised primitive fire that burned up fifty men, and then repeated it and consumed the second fifty. On another occasion they caused 80,000 Syrian soldiers, in one night, to become "dead corpses." Even this was no great marvel, compared with what they did in drowning all the inhabitants of Earth, except a small remnant, to continue the practice of their marvels upon.

Some men they made to walk upon water. Others, to pass through the waters, dry shod. Three men they kept from burning, when in the midst of a fiery furnace, so that their garments had not a singe upon them. When one of these same men was thrown into a den of Lions, the Spirits made those Lions to be at peace with him till morning. He being taken out and his enemies thrown in, they broke their bones and ate them up for breakfast. Considerate and discriminating Lions!!

Are our religious guides blind to these and a long list of similar facts? Have they been deceiving us for filthy lucre's sake, or are they only blind to the underlying Laws—the occult forces of Nature? Is it really "like Priest, like People?" so that ghostly stories, if modern, puzzle? Dr. Phelps' son Henry, of Stamford, was a medium for ghostly stone throwing. They broke the Dr.'s windows, daily, with stones. They stoned the carriage when Henry was in it, passing to the neighbors. They threw stones all the way from house to house, and when he was in the house they threw stones on to the roof and all around the premises.

How would it work for our Protestant Clergy and their people, who so freely and so fully believe the ancient records of this class of marvelous facts and phenomena, upon the evidence of other people's senses, to attend at Chittenden, examine, investigate and report to us, upon the evidence of their own senses and upon the evidence of witnesses living there, as capable and credible as themselves? And thus teach us the scientific laws upon which those ancient facts—Bible marvels—rested; that we simple people may avail ourselves of the same laws, by which to explain and make plain the far more incontestable and better substantiated modern facts and phenomena of our own day and time? Or else, let us all be consistent, and reject the so-called supernatural manifestations, both ancient and modern.

CATHOLICS AND PROTESTANTS VS. SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA.

"THE protestant church begins by denying their occurrence, except as examples of legerdemain; but when confronted with some peculiarly striking phenomenon, either attributes it to an occult force, under control of the medium, or circle, or as a last refuge, finds a satisfactory explanation in the direct interposition of the devil. The church of Rome, on the other hand, admits the facts without argument, and if they happen outside her own jurisdiction, passes them to the credit of Satan."

Dr. Alcott.

JESUS CHRIST.

If there was ever a thorough non-sectarian, that individual was Jesus. Yet this same name has been misused by an almost innumerable body of sectarians, as the corner-stone of peculiar dogmas, each crying "Lo, here is Christ!" and declaiming with as strong vehemence, and much unchristian grace, against all differing, yet neighboring persuasions. To be "evangelical always, sectarian never," is "the blest tie that binds our hearts in Christian love." Herein is the true life-line of conduct by which we may all be "made fishers of men," for their salvation. That the gospel of Christ "is the power of God, unto an increasing salvation," there is no room for doubting, in the minds of any truly consecrated Christian.

Christ came upon the earth to lay down and leave a rule of life that would save men before they died; to relieve all from becoming "dead in trespasses and sins." This rule of life is not an arbitrary commandment to any, but a loving invitation to all, to live as Jesus lived. In the simplest and most affectionate terms does Jesus address all: "If any one would be my disciple, let him live as I do;" which, being continued or transposed, teaches us simply that if we do not live as Jesus lived, we cannot be his disciples—cannot be rewarded as his disciples are and will be. Nowhere do we find the good man, Jesus, enunciating anathemas because men chose not to follow in his footsteps. He sorrowed for them; he prayed for them; he died, and more, he lived for their conviction and conversion. But he never needed to send apostates to the punishments of endless torments, for he well knew that with their light becoming darkness they had hell enough already. He was "lifted up," a character purer, better, more lovely in every sense than aught on earth; and by this elevation he "would draw all men unto" the principles he loved and practiced. If we ever become like him it will be by persuasion, conversion; never by compulsion.

Who can read a certain sentence in Christian at Work for October 29, under head of "AT THE CONFESSORIAL," without the conviction that we have in it the boiling down of multitudes of arguments for Christ—the whole rule of life for a Christian, printed in five lines? Remembering that any other sect might, with the same propriety, displace "Episcopalians," editor Talmage writes those words that can never die: "*Episcopalians are to learn * * * and not forget that those who are living THE CHRIST LIFE ON EARTH, under whatever denominational banner, are all one Church—all one under their glorious Head!*" Here we have the gospel in so simple and plain language that "he who runs may read," and none need be mistaken.

To live the Christ life here on the earth is the resurrection most desirable; because, by this rising up out of ourselves and donning the character of him who died daily unto sin, we have a perfect example, the results of which accrue to us the hundred fold of heavenly blessings, heaped up and running over with the life that is eternal to-day. If all should live the life of Christ, as did Jesus, would they not already be in possession of the eternal life promised? And wherein did Jesus ever die, but unto a worldly life? True, he was crucified, and passed beyond; but that was not death to him. So, if we will live the Christ life, we shall never die, except unto the world, with all its affections and lusts. "Evangelical always," we shall want to live the Christ life, and then teach it. "Sectarian never," we shall care not by what name a brother or sister is called; the only question we need ask is, Do you love and live the Christ life?

G. A. Lomas, Watervliet, N.Y.

SECOND APPEARING OF CHRIST, ORDER OF ITS INCREASE.

IN the First Appearing the following facts were manifested: First, a virgin life; Second, goods in common; Third, non-resistance; Fourth, separation from the world. Observe how these testimonies refer themselves to the life and teachings of the man of Nazareth 1st, "He who looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery." "Blessed are the pure in heart." And the example of his life. 2nd, Jesus and his disciples had goods in common. 3d, Non-resistance, "My kingdom is not of this world, if it were, then would my servants fight." When one who was with Jesus smote off the ear of one of those who came to take him, he healed the ear, and said, "Put up thy sword within its sheath," etc. Again, when asked if fire might not be called down and consume his enemies, he said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of." Lastly, when he had gathered a few under the shadow of his spirit, he said, "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not." Note A. The primitive church followed in the same line, a virgin life, goods in common, separation from the world, and non-resistance. Some of the early Christians suffered death, rather than bear arms. We see that the conditions of a sinless life in the First Appearance, were purity of thought and person. No selfish interests. Non-assimilation with the world, and an attitude of peace toward all men. All who abode in the teachings of the Apostles embodied the foregoing testimonies. After a lapse of time, the gentile Christians, composed of married people, carnal Corinthians, etc., overshadowed the primitive church, and trod it under foot. Finally, nothing remained as a whole, of these cardinal testimonies. This state of things remained during the dark ages, and for more than a hundred years after the Reformation. The Puritans, the Non-conformists, the Covenanters, the Quakers and the French Prophets, prepared the way for the Second Appearing of Christ.

Ann Lee embodied in herself, as did Jesus, the foregoing testimonies. And the Shaker church is a living transcript of the Primitive church, on a broader foundation. It includes the woman as an integral part in government, and in procedure. The Shaker church, its homes and property, are open to all who will embody, in themselves, purity of thought, devotion to the body of Christ (not to self), non-assimilation with the world, and the spirit of peace. The lust of the flesh is chief of the propensities. The Shakers, of to-day, freely declare, that not a single animal propensity can have a place in heaven; the products of the propensities—flesh and blood—cannot go there. Hence, the order of the INCREASE, in the Second Appearing, will be in the line of giving no place to any propensity. The lust of eating is nearly allied to the lust of the flesh, feeds its fires, and is prone to unfit the body for the in-dwelling of the Holy Spirit. This lust, when indulged, creates disease, bodily inefficiency, and premature decay. The signs of the times in and out of the Shaker church, point to this lust as the next in order to be dealt with, not smoothly, and fearfully, and very gently, but that each one, him and her, grapple with it, put it in its place, and so render the digestive functions subservient to health, strength and purity of life. There is no need of sin; neither is there any need of sickness. Put them both away.

The more advanced, outside of the Shaker church, advise the use of unbolted flour and the fruits in their season, in preference to much animal food. The more advanced, inside, testify, that over-eating, and all animal foods, oysters, etc., stimulate the lust of the flesh, and ought to be discontinued in the Church of Christ. Killing animals for food, violates the higher instincts of our being, hardens and petrifies the feelings, and is so repulsive, that it is a hard matter to find a Shaker brother willing to butcher animals. The use of superfine flour is a great waste, and directly contrary to the injunction "Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost." It is deficient in brain or nerve food, and when combined with saleratus or soda, the case is aggravated. The chemicals impart to the tissues placidity, and are, no doubt, a predisposing cause to a softening of the brain; and of course to insanity. When the cooks get up a dish of superfine flour-bread toast, just think of this.

The prevailing debility, and all the disorders of the digestive organs refer themselves to improper food, over-eating, and to bad air. Flesh meats, butter, milk, pastry, etc., at one meal, are all together out of place. Live to be well, and not for indulgence. Let each one, according to his or her calling, be a power for good in this direction. There is such a thing, at all times, as the patience of the saints.

All true progress in this, or in any other direction, will consolidate existing order. "I am the vine, ye are the branches." It is the function of the branches to show growth—to progress to more light. It is the function of the trunk to consolidate the eliminated products of growth. So in the Church of Christ, the novitiate orders will be the first to show growth; that is, if they are good for any thing; and when the crudities of that growth are eliminated, let the choicest atoms be consolidated into the appropriate orders. The branches cannot bear fruit of themselves; the leaves cannot be the roots. The order of divine life cannot be less perfect than plant life.

Daniel Fraser, Shirley, Mass.

BERLIN, N. J., Jan. 26th, 1875.

Dear Friend Eaton:—For several years past I have desired to write an article for the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS, on the position of Christ in relation to war, but you have so many better writers within your own society, I have thought you would not care about communications from so imperfect an outsider as myself, I will however, send you a few lines and you can do with them as you think best.

During the late terrible war, nearly all the ministers in this nation, preached war as a Christian duty. Their texts were always the words of Christ, where he commanded his disciples to take swords. Had they understood the true meaning of that command, instead of its favoring war it would have been a most emphatic and decided testimony against war. When he sent forth his apostles to preach, he commanded them to take neither gold, silver, brass, purse or scrip, nor two coats apiece, and at the same time told them he sent them even as sheep among wolves, and that they should have power over all devils.

Now, if swords are necessary for protection, by whom could they be needed more than by people who go, as sheep, in the midst of wolves? If Christ believed in war, why did he not arm them then? What was the sequel? Why, they went forth as he had commanded, and a divine power went with them and opened the hearts of certain classes to supply their wants, and the same divine power restrained the wolves, their enemies, so that no one could lay hands on them. They needed no swords, though like sheep among wolves, for the Lord God of Hosts was as a wall of fire round about them.

When they returned he said unto them, Lacked ye any thing? and they replied: No, nothing. He said to them, Take swords, and he that hath no sword, let him sell his coat and buy one. They answered; here are two, and he told them they were enough. If his intention was to fight, would he have expected to conquer all that would come against him, with two swords? Nay, verily. He had no intention of fighting. The same scripture declares that he knew his hour had come. Why then did he want swords? For the purpose of bearing a final and decisive testimony against war, by showing that though armed he would not permit his disciples to fight. If his disciples had no swords, people might have questioned whether he would not have fought if he had been armed. But having swords and forbidding his disciples to use them, even to save his own life, was a testimony that none need doubt nor mistake. Yet the blind leaders of the blind, who with their followers are all wallowing in the filth of their own lusts, have taken this last testimony, of Christ against war, plain and simple as it is and made it mean just the opposite of what Christ intended, so that in the late war were seen people who professed to be the followers of the Prince of Peace, mangling and destroying each other. Orthodox arrayed against Orthodox, Methodists against Methodists, and so on through a hundred different sects, all arrayed against each other, all praying to the same imaginary War Demon for success, against each other, while priests all over the nation were shouting, "Christ commanded his disciples to take swords, and therefore it is the duty of Christians to unangle and kill those who never harmed them, at the beck of ungodly demagogues, to preserve a Union that each generation has a right to dissolve!"

Your Friend,

J. Hacker.

Friend Hacker is right—and wrong—right, in his idea that war is wrong—wrong, in his idea that Jesus and the apostles were infallible in judgment, perfect in knowledge, and that the Protestant Bible is the word of God, a finality.

Jesus and the apostles were all born Jews—born of Jewish women, and educated, by them, under the Mosaic Law, and traditions then existing.

Joha, the Baptist, and his disciples had a similar schooling.

Jesus was over thirty, when he began a new departure, under influences, coming from far above all heavens ever known to the Jews, and from spheres into which David had not yet ascended.

Filton has borne strong testimony to the fact, that early libidinal theological ideas have a tremendous power of cohesion with the soul.

Jesus and his disciples, like Ann Lee and her disciples, were converts to the missionary labors of the Christ-spirit, who came to introduce, to humanity, a New Order—the Resurrection.

By the Law, was the knowledge of the sins of the flesh, in the marriage relation. It taught use, not indulgence, of the reproductive forces. Under that Law, Jesus and his disciples could attend weddings. In Christ, they ceased to marry, and to attend marriages. They neither bought nor sold private property. If they used war power, in the Temple, it was while under the inspiration of the God of the House, for the purpose of restoring that House to its normal condition, as a Jewish Temple. There was no Christianity about the Temple, nor any Christian service performed therein.

The Christ spirits impressed Jesus that he had been transgressing.

Calvin Green, a deeply-inspired man, claimed that Jesus, himself, put the sword into the hands of the Jews, by which they took his life.

Is it not quite as simple to admit, that when Jesus and his disciples armed themselves with two swords, they anticipated spirit assistance, similar to what they received when clearing the Temple? that the Christ-spirit withdrew from them? Hence the exclamation, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me!"

This accords with the present light of the writer of this article, for which none other is responsible, accountable, or accusable.

CUTTING OFF AND PUTTING ON.

DID Jesus ever travail beyond that mixed condition? Was it one of the cases wherein he learned obedience, to the Christ-spirit, by what he suffered—for what he had done, or allowed to be done, under the impulse of his Jewish proclivities?

Did not Ann Lee illustrate the same forces, while travelling out of her inherited and acquired Gentileism? Did putting on the ear, by a Gift of healing, under the law of materialization, prove both the War and the Peace principles to be of the Christ-spirit? Or was War Jewish, and Peace Christian? Is it advisable to thus blow hot and cold with the same breath? Babylon means mixture. Was not the whole transaction of that character? Would any of us be willing to have any one man cut off our ear, or nose, for the sake of letting some other man replace it, by supernatural agency?

If right to put the ear on, was it right to cut it off? Or had Jesus missed the mark, when he gave his disciples liberty to possess themselves of swords—carnal weapons? They not only had arms, like soldiers, but used them.

As a natural man, history furnishes none more perfect, in generation, than Jesus. Ann Lee, in relation to war, was, in testimony and practice, equally perfect. The council of Peace is betwixt them both. Neither, without the other, is complete—for it is not good for man to be alone—and vice versa.

After the experience of many centuries, with the reflection that comes of leisure, Jesus may have helped Ann, in her travail. She affirms that he walked and talked with her in the Spirit World.

May we not be pardoned, should we presume to think that the twelve Apostles, as they sit upon their twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, look down upon the world of Gentile Christianity, and judge the great, bloody Whore? All Religious Organizations that preach peace and practice war, outside of their organizations, and, to this day, maintain the Inquisition, in some of its hydra-headed forms, inside of every religious institution in Christendom.

Babylon Christians, who worship Jesus as God, justify marriage, and hold it a Sacrament, because Jesus attended a wedding. And they equally justify war, because his disciples had war weapons, up to the time of his final arrest by the Romans.

Why is the Testimony of Christ's Second Appearing superior to the First? Is it not because more perfect in separating the chaff from the wheat—the false from the true—the flesh from the Spirit?

NEW ENFIELD, N. H., December 25, 1874.

DEAR ELDER FREDERICK:—On this Christmas day, I feel in duty bound, in profound respect, to express my gratitude to you, believing you a true Prophet and radical Reformer of Reforms—removing the rubbish and superstition of by-gone ages—clearing and preparing the way for a new structure, both in physical and spiritual philosophy. I go with you, heart and hand, as far as I comprehend your logic. Your ideas of Jesus of Nazareth, as given, from time to time, agree with my perceptions of right—also the Thunders, uttering their voices. Testimonies against divers evils. I'm glad the "Old Dams" are giving way, to make room for something better.

I love the SHAKER AND SHAKERESS. It affords me much satisfaction. Above all other things, I desire a pure heart and clear understanding of spiritual things.

The work of God is moving swiftly. Quite a number are gathering here. I am thankful for the "Seven Thunders that are uttering their voices." Am glad that some are privileged to hear, understand and obey, as far as I have. I can say, with you, "It comforts my spirit to see the young men and women coming up to the help of the Lord, against the mighty influences of evil."

You have fought the good fight, and kept the living faith, in your own soul, and in the souls of many others. The "Second Thunder" is roaring in the heavens. The old Theological Dams are giving way. The stagnant waters are being stirred, as never before.

I am thankful for all the self-denial I have practiced in eating and drinking. I have born my cross, against flesh meats, more than twenty years. Since I came here, I have been as strict a vegetarian as ever before, and am enjoying comfortable health. It is a general time of health here.

We, Shakers, have many things to learn of the Jews—and Jews have many things to learn of Shakers.

I claim the right to think—to reason—the right of conscience. I claim that Woman is the equal of Man—possessing the same rights—and that the Land belongs, by inalienable right, to the Race—not to individuals. When I first heard of man's taking possession of a tract of land, calling it his own and selling it at a high price, I was surprised.

When quite young, I considered it unjust, for a Lawyer, or Doctor, to charge a poor man $5 for five minutes' service. I never have courted opposition, nor persecution. May have been too silent to such wrongs. I have stood still to see the Salvation of God. I may have stood still altogether too long. I perceive there are physical, as well as theological errors, not only in the natural, but in the Spiritual Orders. He, that iterates, and reiterates them, is not an enemy, but a friend—even as Truth is our friend.

Elders Abram and Orvil wish me to send their Love. Accept my Love and Blessing, for yourself and all your Family.

ELECTION, TEMPERANCE, LAND.

ETERNAL, abiding and unchanging law: Truth is the only fore-ordination that ever was or ever will be. We are nominated and drawn by the Father, but our election depends on the Mother, in the tangible form of works; deeds of holiness and righteousness qualified by temperance. Under the law the heirs of temperance are promoted to honor and trust, to office and to the teaching, with grace and truth, gifts of the spirit, healing, speaking in unknown tongues, etc. So far the "Shakers" have done well in fulfilling the law of Moses and the teaching of Christ, relative to marriage, duty to God, duty to our fellow creatures, abstinence from strong drink, swine's flesh, etc. In the primitive, or Father's adopted Church, a wife was permitted. The permission lasted into the setting up of the Mother Church. The ax hath been used for all advances in progression. It has lopped off, in that Church, husband and wife, strong drink, swine's flesh. The ax will be wielded further. All permissions must run out. Offenses must cease in proportion to Church progress.

POETIC.

WINE is a mocker of pleasure and health, Money a mocker of treasure and wealth. Parties for gain are easy to make, But all selfish cords, they are easy to break. The vows of its colleagues it often betrays, Like unto the serpent it hath crooked ways, And however proper the aim for its use, It seems as though doomed to a constant abuse. It, like the future, will bring on a day When bartering will be the unfaltering way. Flesh-meat is a mocker of pure nature's plan, The soil of the clamorous woman and man; The soil for disquiet, for those not above it, And every base passion, and all who do covet; A soil, void of mercy, where cruelty reigns and bindeth its subjects in pernicious chains. Without good, hand labor to baffle its might, All peace, love and quiet will flee out of sight. As demoniac food, it carries its laws, Demoniac labor, effect of its cause—Tobacco, it mocketh at virtue's promotion, It stifles the voice in heart-pure devotion. The subordinate coffee and tea, with the rest, Are mockers of need, and of comfort at best. Other "parties" of these, below and above, Are mockers in deed of impartial love. The purchase of land for mere love of gain, Is mocking the prudent, the wise and the sane. The monopolizer enjoyeth not worth, The "meek," it is said "shall inherit the earth." Of what mood or manner of spirit we are, It is good to be mindful in hours of prayer. Our needs they are simple, are cheap and all plain, Requiring no extra of labor or pain. The lusts of the eye make us strive to acquire—The more that we gain the more we desire. Let us strive for that food which does satisfy, The food of the Angels that comes from on high.

J. Barnett, Pleasant Hill, Ky.

AVERSION TO MANUAL LABOR.

THE practice of educating boys for the professions, which are already overstocked, or for the mercantile business, in which statistics show that ninety-five in a hundred fail of success, is fearfully on the increase in this country. Americans are annually becoming more and more averse to manual labor; and to get a living by one's wits, even at the cost of independence and self-respect, and a fearful wear and tear of conscience, is the ambition of a large proportion of our young men. The result is, that the mechanical professions are becoming a monopoly of foreigners, and the ownership of the finest farms, even in New England, is passing from Americans to Irishmen and Germans. Fifty years ago a father was not ashamed to put his children to the plow or to a mechanical trade; but now they are "too feeble" for bodily labor, one has a pain in his side, another a slight cough, another "a very delicate constitution," another is nervous, and so poor Bobby, or Billy, or Tommy is sent off to the city to measure tape, weigh coffee, or draw molasses. It seems never to occur to their foolish parents that moderate manual labor in the pure and bracing air of the country is just what these puny, wasp-waisted lads need, and that to send them to the crowded and unhealthy city is to send them to their graves. Let them follow the plow, swing the sledge, or shove the foreplane, and their pinched cheeks will be expanded, their sunken cheeks plumped out, and their lungs, now "cabined, cribbed and confined," will have room to play. Their nerves will be invigorated with their muscles; and when they shall have cast off their jackets, instead of being thin, pale, vapid coxcombs, they shall have spread out to the size and configuration of men. A lawyer's office, a counting room, or a grocery is about the last place to which a sickly youth should be sent.—Colorado Republican.

COST OF THE LATE WAR. MR. DAVID A. WELLS has furnished the Cobden Club of England with an essay upon the expenses, income and taxes of the United States. We copy the following statement of the cost of the Rebellion:

The whole cost of the war to the Northern and Southern States from 1861 to 1866 is estimated as follows: Lives, $1,000,000; property, by destruction, waste, etc., $9,000,000,000. The gross expenditures of the United States from June, 1861, to July, 1866, $5,732,257,000. Of this the actual expenses were about $5,342,237,000.

COVETOUSNESS.

COVETOUSNESS is idolatry. How men bow down and worship mammon, the god of the world.

When this spirit is allowed to grow, and is cultivated, and remains unchecked, how sad, how blighting its effects.

Look at the man who has piled up his millions, is he happy? Is he satisfied? Nay, my. The spirit of greed has grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength; dried up every spring of benevolence and kindness in his heart, and holds him with an iron grasp.

He is blind, foolish, and infatuated with madness.

Perhaps he is an old man, just standing upon the edge of the grave, all his hopes, desires, affections and aspirations, buried in a little lump of earth.

See him! bent with age, bent still worse earthward with the spirit of base, sensual, covetous desire. All the rich treasures of Heaven, just above him, but he knows it not. He is a stranger to the christian's peace, and the delightful ministrations of angels. They have no communion with him. When he dies, a dark cloud settles over him, and he takes a "leap in the dark," unattended by any escort, except it be from spirits like himself, whose society will only increase his misery.

Well might the poet say:

"Though a broad stream of golden sands,
Through all his meadows roll,
He is but a wretch; with all his lands,
Who wears a narrow soul."

Let the youth beware of covetousness; nip this spirit in the bud. Be moderate in all your earthly desires. Be thankful if surrounded with those who are trying by precept and example to inspire in you the beauty of a truly noble, pure and unselfish life.

Keep the window of your soul wide open on the sunny side of Heaven.

Think how many more blessings you have than many others, and more than you deserve. Rejoice when you see others receiving attention, or enjoying favors which you do not possess.

Strive to make others happy, and in this way you will be gathering good to yourself, and sowing seed which will produce a harvest of everlasting joy.

Gilbert Hubbard, Mount Lebanon, N. Y.

How rare to see truly happy and venerable old age! Why is it so? Life means progress and evolution.

If Immortality have sense or meaning, it must mean Advance movement from lower to higher—progress in truth and light—stripping off shackles of ignorance and prejudice—delivering the spiritual nature of man from the bondage of the low animal nature—unveiling new truths—enabling the soul to grow into angelic condition, that it may see God and live in him.

Let this course be pursued, and the more we increase in years the better we will learn our lesson, know our duty and do it—the more ready will we be to give up bad habits and learn good ones—the more easy to practice self-denial—to leave behind what is low and earthly, and grow into the Divine and Heavenly.

To refuse or neglect this our high vocation, to shrink at a little matter of cross, would be to pawn, with faint hope of redemption, our heavenly birth-right for a most miserable kind of pottage.

Do we realize this? I will labor with all earnestness, that as I advance in years I may advance in true spiritual life and power, that with increase of years the cross against lower law influences will be correspondingly lighter.

Would any of you, my dear Gospel Sisters and Brothers, relinquish your right to personal immortality, to the joys of higher worlds? I will not.

Let us all be nice and clean and sweet, and see to it that neither that which goeth in at the mouth nor that which cometh out defiles the Temple of God.

Let us look a little deeper—not neglecting vigilance in meats and drinks, using only such as conduce to purity of body and soul—let us look into the think, and see what is harbored there. Are thoughts admitted there that would not look well printed in large capitals and pasted on the outside?

Know we not that we are the Temple of God? Know we not that impure thoughts defile the temple quite as much as superfine flour, alcohol, tea, coffee, drugs, or the dead carcasses of oxen, sheep or swine?

What the prospects of such as defile the Temple of God? Let us drop the curtain.

Julius Assman, Canaan, N. Y.

We have been permitted to make another extract from an unpublished work of travels in Central Africa.

On the north branch of the Gonil river in a secluded country we found a colony of Quakers or friends. They were a very isolated people, having little intercourse with the tribes around them. They used the plain language and never resorted to arms, being non-resistants. In their government they had very admirable police arrangements. The force was composed of strong athletic men and women, who used no weapons but acted the part of care-takers of the insane. These people believed that any one who violated the rights of others or committed any crime was of unsound mind and to a certain extent insane, and it was considered to be a duty to restrain these until they gave evidence of restoration to health. They denied that there was any right to punish any one, the law carrying its penalties with it, and the compunction of conscience being greater where human authority did not interfere and attempt to punish.

They claimed the right and the power to restrain any person who acted in a manner that was injurious to themselves or to others. They used just sufficient restraint to prevent this, and in doing this they were always very careful to avoid any appearance of vindictive feelings or punishment toward those on whom it was used.

Their police arrangements worked so quietly that one would scarcely know of its existence, great care was taken to avoid any public manifestations, under the belief that they were not beneficial to society, and they kept all such things sacredly quiet, and persons were often restrained for a time, and came forth without its being known to any except those who had kindly cared for them.

In their dealings with one another they were strictly honest, preferring each other in all things.

Their mode of worship was like that of the friends in civilized countries. They came together every day in a social manner, and sat in silent meditation until some one, either man, or woman, or child, was moved to speak. There was a solemn dignity about their meetings, which was felt by all. The remarks of the young children even, were often very feeling and impressive. Their meeting closed with social greetings, conversation and gymnastic exercises.

They claimed to be influenced directly by the Holy Spirit. Their religious views were very plain and simple, always avoiding unpleasant controversies. There was a general feeling of love, and forbearance prevailed.

They believed in one God, the great central ruling power of the universe and the Holy Spirit which they believe was sent by God to comfort them and enlighten them in their every-day duties. They carried their religion into all departments of life, and had no observance of days and times; believing all days to be alike holy, they did not set apart one day in seven as is done by most religious denominations.

They considered oaths as an abomination, and held that every person was sacredly bound to speak the truth at all times and under all circumstances, and hence had no idea of going through any form to make a person, under special conditions, tell the truth; for, said they, this would be an admission that they might tell falsehoods all the rest of the time. They were exceedingly plain and exemplary in regard to their dress, while all were left free. The rule generally adopted was economy, utility and comfort. There was no rigid rule confining any one to a particular form or color; each one was left to follow their taste and inclinations.

There was a great deal of freedom and sociability among them; living pure lives, their intercourse was free and without any suspicion, and hence they were a very happy people. Individual conscience was respected always as the real standard, and each one was left free to act according to their highest and best impressions and the dictates of their consciences, with no other restraint than those we have referred to in regard to the rights of others and injury to themselves.

Their form of government was very simple. Each individual being a law unto themselves there was very little need of any external laws. Their education was universal, and by common consent all children were sent to school, the boys and girls together, and they were taught such branches of knowledge as were calculated to strengthen and develop their minds, while the physical was also properly attended to. This spirit of equality, based upon capacity, was carried out in all departments, and woman stood side by side with man, a participant in all things according to capacity. No arbitrary standard of equality was professed, but the divine equality of right measured by capacity alone, was the standard universally accepted.

Though they were a simple minded people, they were not devoid of artistic taste in their houses and in the laying out and cultivation of their gardens.

The country, being a very fertile one, produced spontaneously almost every thing that was needed for their subsistence.

Yet, unlike most persons who live in such countries, they were an industrious people, having an innate sense of the necessity of working in natural things in order to develop their own powers. There were no very wealthy persons and no poor. They were not allowed to hold any more land than they could properly cultivate, and their habits were such that avarice was not at all fostered in any one, and any manifestation of it was considered an evidence of unsoundness of mind and a subject for moral restraint first, and if it did not stop with this, the restraint was carried further.

The purity of their lives, the freedom of their intercourse, and the happy relations they sustained to each other in their families and as a community, presented features which we had never witnessed in any other country.

We asked some of them why they did not mingle with other tribes; they remarked that they had not found any other people who were willing to live as they did, and therefore it seemed best to them to keep their community isolated, and the tribes around had not yet attained to a position to comprehend and live out the principles which they felt called upon to manifest in their lives to the world. Their idea was, that they were descendants of two families of very good men and women, who settled in that country many years ago.

SOW WELL—REAP WELL.

BELOVED YOUTH IN ZION: There is no greater fallacy than that entertained by many of your class, that they can obtain real happiness in a way suited to their worldly desires. This "Philosopher's stone" can never be found, and all who spend their lives in search of it will be disappointed and ruined. It is folly, O, youth, to think that you can form vicious habits, and, on arriving at maturity, cast them off as easily as you can change your garments! God never fails to reward good and punish evil deeds, and the law of God is, you shall reap that which you sow; that, and not something else! If you will sow "wild oats," depend upon it the result of your folly will be a fearful harvest of vices! If you give loose rein to sinful practices, deplorable consequences must and will follow! You cannot avert them. If you sow to the flesh, of the flesh you will reap corruption! Loss of peace, loss of happiness, disappointment and shame to yourselves; these are the bitter fruits of a sinful life.

Let this truth always be remembered; the prize of salvation is not obtained without personal exertion; if you desire it, it may be yours, but only by earnest, persevering effort in self-denial, while beset with difficulties of every kind. Hence, should any of you be debating, in your minds, a change of profession, thinking that you may have a "genius" for some other mode of life, hoping to find salvation by "climbing up some other way," dismiss the thought at once, as a temptation of Satan to do evil. If your trials and temptations are great while bearing the cross, do not make them greater by deserting it, but spend all your energies in clinging to it as the life-boat that sustains you on the ocean of time. If you leave it, it is certain you will go down; you will be lost! But if you bend every energy to the self-denying work, your love for your profession will increase, and, ultimately, victory will crown your efforts; you will safely outride every storm on the rough sea of nature, and arrive secure in the haven of eternal rest, cheered and directed by "the star of purity."

Daniel Orcutt, Enfield, Conn.

ANGER. Never speak in anger, however much cause you may imagine you have for so doing; as you not only lower yourself in the esteem of others, but lose your own self-respect, and consequently your confidence; and you cannot hold up your head with that manly or womanly dignity that you might have done had you governed your passion. "He that is slow to anger, is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city."

A PURE life is strength from on high, the enactor of it can speak with authority.

SHAKERESS.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

"THE POOR MAN CRIED AND THE LORD HEARD HIM," ISA.

—o—

WE live in an age of profound thought and deliberation. In society at large great inequality exists—riches and poverty abound to an alarming extent. The toiling millions who spend their energies in rearing magnificent mansions for the capitalists to luxuriate in, while they dwell in rude cottages, and subsist on scanty allowance of food and deficient clothing, feel sorely oppressed; and they dream of a better state of things in a day which they believe will dawn upon them in the future. When they read the avowal of the Founders of the American government, that "All men are created free and equal," they keenly feel the injustice of the state of society as it now exists. Thousands are heard to say that a Christianity that does not take into account, and provide for the physical, as well as the spiritual needs of its subjects, is spurious—wanting in essence and vital energy.

The public mind has conceived the idea that somehow, through the communistic principle, a true Brotherhood is the possibility of the race. Although it is divided in opinion as to the most sure method of attaining that desired object, whether to work from a rational, socialistic and benevolent basis, or to combine the material, intellectual and spiritual, in one grand system that represents, comprehends, and supplies, the entire needs of the whole man and woman.

The late Horace Greeley, an acknowledged philanthropist, who gave his thoughts and life labors in a large degree to benefit and uplift human society from oppression and want, irrespective of their religious creeds or professions, wrote thus: "Christ never intended that of his disciples a few should enjoy every costly luxury which imagination could suggest, while millions famished and shivered, wanting the very necessities of life.* * *

"Man is fallen and is divided; he must be raised and re-united. Darkened in understanding, and made gross by sensuality, he needs to be taught his first duty to his brother. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' How read you this, ye upholders of War, Slavery, and that Social Order which leaves millions to grow up in Ignorance, Want and Temptation; which provides prisons for the guilty, and poor-houses for the helpless and starving, but makes no provision that the still innocent and nobly striving, shall have Opportunity to earn needful Bread?

"Tell me not this is Christian Society, in which the widow sits toiling from dawn till midnight, consuming her slender remnant of health and vision, to earn of her sister, in the Church, the smallest modicum of food and shelter with which her tender babes can exist. The frightful excess of Social anarchy, misery, and destitution, in the midst of the most abundant wealth and prodigality the world has ever known, is driving millions to inquiry and study with regard to their causes and their cure. Division, Alienation, Isolation, are the bane of our Race." Were truer words ever spoken or written than those?

We honor Horace Greeley for his efforts to roll forward the car of human progress. He was the poor man's friend. He felt the throbbings of the great heart of humanity, and his soul was moved with compassion, while he sought to understand the producing causes of individual and society wrongs, and if possible to find and point out a remedy. He was evidently a man of high culture, possessed strong intellectual powers, and his reason and conscience were in harmony. And we would bestow "honor where honor is due." We highly appreciate, and honor all honest laborers in the field of reform, who give their time and talents, to lessen human woe; and set up way marks to guide the rising and incoming generations, in paths of virtue and integrity.

"All men are created free and equal," says the Declaration of American Independence. That must be accepted in a qualified sense. We cannot say truthfully, that all are equal in physical strength nor in intellectual powers; but all have a right to life, and to sufficient means to sustain life. There is a great variety of intellect and capacity in the human family adapted to meet the varied conditions in society; and that diversity, if rightly used, and not abused, is a blessing.

The head of any body of people, either religious, civil, or social, should never oppress any of the members pertaining to it; not even the least. If this be done, the life fluid which should circulate as freely through the limbs, of the body, as through the head, and trunk, is obstructed, causing pain and disease.

Some persons in the pursuit of happiness, would naturally turn to the cultivation of the soil—others to hewing wood and drawing water. Another class would seek to learn and teach the sciences by which those branches of industry can be performed to the greatest profit, with the least amount of labor. Talents thus used are beneficial to society and a blessing to humanity; there is neither wrong nor oppression in it. Those who are leaders, in the order of their creation, by the inherent powers which they possess, will rise to occupy their proper position, as heads in the department to which they belong; and justice demands that the superior talents, which is Nature's gift to them for the benefit of others, should be used to promote the happiness and well-being of every member of the body over which they are called to preside.

Leaders should be unselfish workers. As society is now organized, multitudes are seeking to live without labor, to eat and drink without giving an honest equivalent; and they "grind the faces of the poor," and the spoil which they unjustly take from the widow and the fatherless is seen in costly mansions and gaudy equipages. Did God ever design that his noblest gifts to man should be thus used for selfish ends and purposes? That strong and brilliant talents should be employed to enrich the few and impoverish the many? By what law are merchantmen enabled to send out their large vessels, heavily laden with costly wares, until they whiten many waters? Or those millionaires who store their wealth in vaults and guard it by a strong force, while the poor man who has given his strength to help create those riches, and now dare not put his finger upon them, reaches out his brawny hand and imploringly asks a morsel of bread for himself and children? Is there no remedy for this state of things? "No balm in Gilead, no physician there?" Surely, we must say with Horace Greeley, "This is not Christianity."

We venture to say, that no person has a right to the elements of subsistence without labor. Statesmen, Scientists, and Theologians, are all in duty bound to perform manual labor, more or less; their physical health requires it; and no one should seek to live by wits alone; and those who do it are not made happy thereby. They may sail over many seas and roam in distant lands, visit the pyramids of Egypt, the cathedrals of Rome, and the fine statuary of Greece, and thus while away the hours; but in the cool of the day, when the shadows of night gather around, conscience speaks, saying, "God is just, and every work will be brought into judgment," and a just recompense be awarded. Dismay fills the mind, when they reflect that the Lord, who placed them in his vineyard to work, will call for his own with usury.

REFLECTIONS UPON SOME OF THE PARABLES OF JESUS.

—o—

IN reading some of the parables put forth by Jesus, I have been led to reflect how much easier it is to make good resolves than to keep them. And how few there are who are really willing to forsake all to follow Christ, when called. Many would gladly grasp the treasures of immortal life, and possess the goodly pearl, but are not willing to pay the price.

Like the young man who addressed Jesus as, "Good Master, what good thing can I do to inherit eternal life?" When Jesus said to him, "Go sell all thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven," he went away sorrowing. His riches were, in reality, the god he served. Jesus said: "Hardly shall a rich man enter the kingdom of heaven." "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head."

Some, without consideration and mature understanding of the cross and self-denial required to become a true follower of Christ, are ready to say, "Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest;" but as soon as they find that if they "would reign with Him, they must also suffer with Him," their courage fails—there are many idols in the way.

One whom Jesus called said, "Suffer me first to go and bury my father." "Let the dead bury their dead," was the reply, which was equivalent to saying they who are dead in trespasses and sins—who are living the natural generative life, and have not been resurrected therefrom—must attend to the duties of that Order. Let them bury their own dead; "preach thou the kingdom of God;" "My kingdom is not of this world," plainly showing there were higher duties to be performed, and that there could be no real fellowship between light and darkness—no blending of flesh and spirit—but that His mission was to draw souls from the worldly life—its affections as well as its lusts—and lead them up to a higher plane.

This was plainly demonstrated by the answer that he gave to one who asked permission "first to go and bid farewell to his friends at home in his own house." Jesus said, "He that putteth his hand to the plow and looketh back is not fit for the kingdom of God."

Jesus plainly taught, by precept and example, that it is not practicable to serve two masters; that no one can be grafted into the New heavenly vine, unless cut off from the Old earthly vine, and that it must cause pain and suffering to die—lose the natural carnal life—to find a life that will be eternal.

Elmira Hills Grove, Canterbury, N. H.

Let our haste to bless good equal our earnestness to reprove evil.

To be fully employed is the best warrant of rapid growth.

WHAT IS SACRIFICE?

At the present time there are comparatively few who call in question the immortality of the human soul; especially since "Spiritualism," the Angel seen by John the evangelist, that descended, "having great power, and lightened the earth with glory," has worked so effectually among the infidel classes, and become a potent agent in removing mysterious doubts which hung over the minds of many, and of unfolding to their vision the realities of the eternal world. The same instrumentality is disenchanting many devotedly religious minds. Though sincere and earnest they were creed-bound and held in strong bands of superstition. Through long ages past, Superstition in matters of Religion has dethroned Reason, occupied its place, and ruled with fearful tyranny.

Now, Aspiration and its unfailing response, Revelation, are moulded by Reason, while liberated Conscience, with her balances, is active in duty; thus, more rational and just conceptions of Deity—of the soul—and of the effect of the present life upon the future are attained. And the fact that our being is twofold, natural and spiritual, is undisputed. Both have their uses. The natural is first—first developed. It is transient, temporary, and must be superseded by the spiritual, which is eternal.

The general idea of heaven is that of condition rather than place. The narrow limits of private family relations of me and mine, with all the selfishness pertaining thereto, are being exchanged for the expansive relationship of beneficent, harmonious fraternity, where the wealth of virtue that vanisheth not, and the joys of Angels which cannot be borne away on Time's fleet pinions, shall be the soul's treasure to possess in a life that is imperishable. But who would call this exchange Sacrifice?

If we give perverted appetites for the true and good in the natural, that is not sacrifice. So, in leaving the natural for the spiritual—the earthly for the heavenly—we lose nothing of permanent worth, even if this be done while in true. In forsaking the friendships and connections formed by our first birth, we test our sincerity and love of truth, and try the affections upon its fiery altar. The result is, a baptism of pentecostal love, which is purified, and new relations are formed in a household of Faith, a heavenly parentage and kindred, near and dear, beneath whose sweet ministrations crosses vanish and give place to blessings. The relations we form with such souls unite us to Angel bands and strengthen us to grow in goodness. By leaving the old for the new, the perishable for the eternal, it is not necessary to undervalue the good of the past.

There are many in the world at large who do not find an element or sphere in which their interior life can unfold. Such often seek to give expression to their feelings by an artistic mode of dress and external decorations; but the deep longings of the soul cannot be satisfied in that way. There is a home for the soul where all is truly refined and beautiful. The soul there becomes as a mansion, lighted with the glory of goodness. The hallowed remembrances of prophetic visions are like beautiful pictures to embellish its walls; and the heart's virtues will bloom and send forth fragrance like sweet scented flowers, growing perpetually beneath the sunlight of truth. Such is the reward of those whose "lines are hid with Christ in God." Can this be called Sacrifice?

Is not the weight of the Christian's Cross and the Sacrifice overestimated by many, and the blessings received undervalued? What is it but giving the inferior for the superior, the artificial for the real? And they whose superior intellectual endowments qualify them for Leaders in the van of Reformers or in literary labors, find strong incentives for the development of those powers, for the Gospel opens a broad field for action and offers a reward known only to those who draw the vital elements of support from the great First Cause, the Fountain of their being. Unto such ministering Angels will open the bright portals of revelation, and they will feel impelled by the powers of the spiritual world to give freely of their treasures to bless humanity, and to yield their lives in unselfish devotion.

It has been ascertained by careful investigation that no individual receiving a just remuneration for labor can amass much wealth in excess of life comforts and necessary expenditures. Only through speculation and monopoly, a system that scatters broad-cast the seeds of vice and destruction, destroys the peace of the Community, and preys upon the heart of the Nation, are riches heaped up. Thus toiling millions, often in servile wretchedness, support the few in wanton extravagance, who at their expense are made wealthy.

And those highly gifted as financiers, who consecrate that talent to the united interests of a religious community, securing for its inmates the just recompense of honest toil, with the assurance that whatever is accumulated will be dedicated to the diffusion of good, derive therefrom supereminent satisfaction, heaven-high above the toilers for selfish gains whose wealth has been wrung from the toil and sufferings of thousands.

We ask again, where is the great Sacrifice?
Catharine Allen, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

RELIGION does not consist merely in the belief that the man Jesus lived a self-denying life, and taught, both by precept and example, that his followers should do the same, neither is it found in wild speculative theories, concerning the doctrines which he taught—while in practice denying them.

It is not pure religion which only recognizes God, and asks assistance on occasions of special need; while in general prosperity, the Father's gifts are woven into selfish interests, and his beneficence forgotten. Neither does it consist in formulas, creeds, modes of worship, and particular styles of dress—all of which may be expressions of religious sentiment, but vitally considered, are not spirit power, quickening the soul into resurrection life and producing good fruits, works, which are the evidence of true religion. Throughout all nations there is an innate idea of worship in some form; and every sect has a corresponding creed, which finds expression in diversified ways.

The Shakers profess not to have a creed, to bind and fetter the soul's progress, the effect generally produced, but they believe in God, as a duality—Father and Mother—and in the soul's progression, without bound or limit. As a sequence of this belief, that God is dual, their order of government is represented in dual form. The male and female work, in harmonic relations, together, as brother and sister in Christ—children of a Heavenly Father and Mother, they are co-workers in building up a household of Christain faith, and promoting the cause of truth. Under the spiritual faith that the true resurrection pertains to the soul, and that whoever comes into Christ, practically, enters the resurrection work. The Shakers give outward expression to their inward feelings, in worship. When they go forth in dances, it is an expression of joy, which they feel, that they are disenthralled—freed from the bondage of sinful passions. In marching they express the idea of traveling home to God—leaving old things of the past for the new—the inferior for the superior. And when they engage in "battles of shaking," it is a sign that all that is false and erroneous must be shaken off, and left behind; and they have found, that shaking is effective, as a means, in disarming the enemies of the soul's peace, and pulling down satan's kingdom.

Religion that works by love and purifies the heart, will demand strict self-denial, and lead to an honest confession of sin, and repentance toward God, and thus souls will gain confidence, and be strengthened to pursue their heavenward journey, step by step, until they stand in perfect justification.

The question is often asked, Can all minds become religious? We believe that every soul is possessed of a germ of spirituality—of love to God. That germ needs cultivation, growth and the means of education, and the free will of individuals to receive and obey light, greatly determine the results. We believe it is a possibility. It is true that many are blest, through a natural inheritance, with a greater degree of spirituality and intuitive perception, than others; and it is apparently easier for them to comprehend the soul's needs, and to receive divine influences; but there is a greater responsibility resting upon such. If they fill the sphere in which they were created to act, they must be connecting links between the lower and still higher grades of beings. Earnest labor, time and growth, will elevate and progress all.

Religion will bring all faculties of mind and body, into harmony of action, in the service of God. It indeed requires great skill, and is a delicate work to guide the heart—turn it away from all its perverse tendencies—to perfect purity; and to guard against pride, vain emulation and self-esteem, and induce humility and love. To learn to prefer and honor others before self, requires constancy and care and battling with worldly temptations.

Religion leads from narrow, selfish conservatism, and teaches Christian benevolence, and universal love. Witness how bounteously are the gifts of our Heavenly Father and Mother spread over the universe; in what variety and profusion; they are sufficient to meet the needs and fill the minds of all. In like manner, finite beings should dispense charity to all who are in need, and from pure motives, give with a liberal hand, as far as consistent. In this way, they become God-like—Christ-like—and fulfill the command, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in Heaven is perfect."

True Religion, then, is the outflowing of the principle of love toward God—the source of all goodness and power. It is like a living, growing, fruit-bearing tree, whose roots are deeply imbedded in the soil of truth, and whose branches are ever reaching upward to the spiritual powers above—the elements of divine life—for nourishment, and to be fed by the Christ-spirit. And they who are engrafted thereon, their "leaf shall not wither," nor their power wane, till eternal life is won—the victory gained. They who toil in earnest, and sow the good seed, then patiently wait for growth, will see the fruition of their hopes and labors.

Elizabeth Martin, Canterbury, N. H.

NORMAL CONDITIONS.

WHEN the marriage institution, under orderly normal conditions, is used to produce a healthy race of beings, who will honor their parents and live according to the laws of their being on the natural plane of existence until they progress beyond that state, and find a growth into the more divine life, the present condition of inharmonies will be changed, and peace, to a great extent, will be established in the earthly order.

If the marriage relation, as claimed, be founded upon love, why is it not more peacefully sustained? Why do the public journals teem with detailed accounts of jealousies, jarring contentions, moroseness of habit and temper, often ending in bloodshed? It is often said, "There is no effect without a cause." There must be a terrible defect somewhere; a great perversion of physical laws; for what are now sometimes pictured in poetic strains as "Matrimonial heavens," to my mind appear more like a pandemonium! and "Hymen's silken bands" might more appropriately be called HEMPEN cords, which in a wily manner coil around its subjects, then fasten and bind with fetters strong as the chains of chattel slavery, which cost much suffering and many lives to break!

The high and low, rich and poor, priests and laymen fall into the same snare! Ye thinking men and women, prophets and prophetesses of the nineteenth century, will ye point out the cause of all this trouble, and show the remedy? Let it be written in language so plain, that they who run may read and understand.
Julia Johnson, West Pittsfield, Mass.

BAPTISM.

BAPTISM, in some form, is the door of entrance into the popular churches. How far the ordinance is efficacious in removing sin from the heart, and giving power to abstain therefrom, is a subject worthy of consideration. The tree must be judged by the fruit it produces.

There are different kinds of baptisms spoken of in scripture. John's baptism of water, which was for the cleansing of the human body, to prevent disease and keep it in a healthy condition, was symbolical, but as essential as the true Christ baptism of "fire and the Holy Spirit," which is to cleanse and purify the soul, consume all grossness from the heart, and burn the chaff, while it gathers and preserves the wheat.

As I take a retrospect of my life's journey, thus far, I can see how kindly I have been dealt with, and how I have been led by unseen hand step by step, in paths that I knew not; and my heart swells with gratitude, as I recount the many blessings which have been dispensed to me; and with the Psalmist of olden time I am led to say, "Goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life."

In early life, I sought to be a Christian. I was admitted into church communion by passing through the rite of baptism by sprinkling. That was as far as my light then led me. After a time, the spirit again strove with me, and seemed to urge me to take another step. I reflected that Jesus was baptized by immersion; and in order to follow him, I must also be immersed. I yielded to convictions of duty, and felt blest, for the time being.

I searched the Scriptures, and found there were Covenants, as well as Baptisms, spoken of; and I sought to understand what those Covenants were. I learned that there were Laws and Statutes and Covenants given to the ancient Israelites in the Mosaic Dispensation; but they were not strong and effective; and "made not the comers thereunto perfect." I also read of a New Covenant that was to be made with the house of Israel, in which the Law was to be written in the hearts of the people; and Christ would sit as a Refiner in his temple, and old things would be done away, and all in his kingdom would become New, and there would be "one faith, one Lord, and one baptism."

Soon after that period, I received a call of the Spirit to come out from the world, its spirit and practice; and to make a full consecration of my whole being to the service of God. I saw and began to understand the New Covenant, and felt the power of a new baptism—the baptism of fire—even the Spirit of Truth. I became a member of the Church of Christ's Second Appearing, and have been striving for many years to delineate the character of a true Believer in Christian principles, by practical life.

The mission of Jesus was not to destroy the Law and Covenants of the past, but to fulfill them, and reveal a higher law—show a more perfect way—while it included all the good. "The law and the prophets were until John;" and it was his mission to call men and women to repentance for all transgressions of the law of Moses, and thus prepare them to receive the kingdom which Jesus came to inaugurate; showing that repentance must precede the reception of new and divine truth. He taught his disciples to pray for that kingdom to come, in which the will of God would be done by mortals on earth, as it is done by Angels in heaven. That kingdom will manifest itself, not in word only, but in saving powers. It will be constituted of souls whom the love of truth draws together—"a peculiar people who are zealous of good works—whose meat and drink it is to do the work of God." Blessed and happy are they who find an inheritance in that kingdom, and with the saints who possess it, have their names enrolled in the Book of Life.

No one can reign with Christ except they be willing to suffer with him. Jesus said to the woman who came to him with a petition for her sons, "Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I shall be baptized with?" He understood full well that few would be willing to be buried with him by baptism into his death, that they might be raised in the likeness of his resurrection. The physical suffering which he endured when he was buffeted, spit upon, forsaken of friends, crowned with thorns, and led as a sheep to the slaughter, were light, compared with the mental suffering and grief of spirit that he felt, when he saw how few were willing to receive the weighty truths which he was sent to confer upon a lost race. When he neared Jerusalem and cast his eyes over the city, and saw how few were willing to accept his teachings, he wept and said, "Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I have gathered you, but ye would not!"

SABBATH.

"GIVE us this day our daily bread," was the prayer of Jesus. The ancient, typical Israel received their manna fresh every day, and if any, through greediness, gathered more than they needed, it decayed—became corrupt—and availed nothing the ensuing day. Is there not in this fact a significance for pilgrims this later day? If we are industrious and prudent may we not trust in Israel's God to give us food suited to our wants and necessities, both temporally and spiritually?

While we are fulfilling the type of the forty years pilgrimage of the children in the Wilderness, if the Lord give us food—manna—from the heavens, will it not be wise for every one to gather for him and herself, in proportion to needs, that thereby we may be nourished and grow? They were instructed to gather, according to their need, but to leave nothing over, except on the sixth day. "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord. Bake that which ye will to-day, and that which remaineth lay up for the morning, for on the Sabbath day ye shall not find it in the field. Let no man go out of his place on the Sabbath. So the people rested on the Sabbath day." What an admirable plan to destroy avarice, and to teach a lesson of dependence and humility!

We would not be understood that we believe the seventh day was better, and more holy than the six preceding days, other than it was sanctified by the people, and devoted to higher and holier uses. But it was meet that one day in seven should be set apart for spiritual culture and elevation, to refrain from secular business. And who does not believe that the physical, temporal and spiritual conditions of the people were improved by the observance of the Sabbath of rest and devotion, on which day they were cited to study the law and scriptures of that time?

And shall we, of the nineteenth century, of what is called the Christian age of the world, refuse to observe the Sabbath in consonance with its real meaning, or spend the time in idleness and recreation, and thus fritter away the golden moments?

It is said of Napoleon, that while on his marches with his army he observed the seventh day of rest, for not only his men, but his horses needed that rest to retain health and vigor, and that theory has the sanction of scientists.

Especially are those who profess to be a "peculiar people, zealous of good works," a "royal priesthood," under the guidance of the Christ-spirit in the male and female order, bound by that profession and by love to God, and duty to our neighbor, to spend the Sabbath as we profess to do, in such a spirit of true consecration, spiritual exercise and devotion, as will be productive of the greatest amount of good to our own souls, and to others, and thus promote the cause of righteousness in the earth.

Now, in this day of Christ's second coming, we cannot present ourselves blameless before God if we do not gather the bread of life wherewith to feed the hungry, and living waters to impart to the thirsty. The earth needs saving—purifying elements to-day—salt that has lost none of its savor.

The day, and time in which we live, call upon us to be men and women of growth and progress, not to lower the standard of holiness, but to exalt it—raise it still higher. It is our privilege to plunge into the "risen waters" and swim clear of those inferior desires and passions which fetter and bind many souls to earth. May we receive a fullness of the promise made to Israel of old, "To the eunuchs that keep my Sabbaths (and Sabbaths of Sabbaths), and choose the things that please Me, and take hold of My covenants, unto them will I give in Mine house and within My walls, a name and place better than of sons and daughters."

E. H. Webster, Harvard, Mass.

RETALIATION.

"RECOMPENSE to no man (or woman) evil for evil." "If thine enemy hunger, feed him" (or her). That is good scripture; it is Christ-like. When we are wronged, it is natural to retaliate—to seek revenge—the reverse of the spirit that would lead us to pray for, and forgive those who despitefully use us. It is easier to talk of forgiving an enemy, than to really do it.

I ask myself this question: If an incendiary should maliciously, without provocation, put the torch to my dwelling—as was recently done at Mt. Lebanon—would I feel like seeking revenge, and rejoice in the infliction of punishment upon that person? I think I can truthfully answer in the negative.

I respect the protective laws of our country, and the judiciary which enforce those laws for the safety of the public; but I would gladly commend the erring to the mercy of God, and of the civil magistrates—if they would repent and sin no more.

The prayer of Jesus for his enemies was, "Father forgive them; they know not what they do." Thus we would pray, and forgive. But if they are not brought, through the medium of their own consciences, nor by the moral influence of their friends, to see the great wrong they have done, it were better for the safety of the community, and even for their own happiness in the end, that they be placed by sentence of law where they cannot continue to bring so great suffering and sorrow upon others.

I am deeply impressed by the recent disastrous fires, with the importance of laying up treasures in that house not made with human hands, beyond the reach of fire or flood.

Nancy G. Danford, Canterbury, N. H.

OATMEAL AS FOOD.

THE advantages of oatmeal as an article of food are getting to be tolerably well understood, and all persons who have commenced its regular use will agree that its nutritious and health-giving properties have not been overrated. Chemical analysis shows that oatmeal is richer than wheat in starch and the nitrogenous compounds, the first being fat-forming and the latter flesh-forming constituents. As compared with barley and corn, oatmeal is found to be still richer in these elements. As food, it sits lightly on the stomach, and is exceedingly digestible. It is one of the best articles of food to give to growing children, and is especially valuable, also, to persons who do brain work. A little oatmeal mixed in water makes a cool and refreshing drink, and farmers and contractors who supply their laborers with it will find it far better than any form of stimulant, and in the long run more satisfactory to the men themselves. Oats grown in far northern localities have larger and plumper grains than any other, and it is for this reason that Scotch oatmeal ranks so high. Excellent oats for mealings, however, are produced in Canada, the New England States, Central and Northern Michigan and Wisconsin.

UNITY IN DIVERSITY.—Man is a progressive being, and therefore essentially imperfect. We are not perfect ourselves, and therefore we should not require perfection in others. Our various degrees of development also render each one of us different from the other. It is unwise and unjust for us to condemn others for being different from us, because we are equally different from them. If we will tolerate others in their difference from us as much as we would have others tolerate us in our difference from them, then we may live together in friendship and peace. But if we censure and abuse others because of their faults and failings, then they may treat us the same for like reason, and that would cause contention and separation. Tolerance secures unity in diversity, and it will be all the more "good and pleasant" for people to "dwell together" in such unity, because variety is said to be "the spice of life."

VOYAGE OF LIFE.

MT. LEBANON, N. Y.

1. Up - on the rock - y shores of Time Our barques might anchored be, Yet pilot - like our spir - its long To cross life's rolling sea.
2. O, youthful mar - i - ner be-ware! Thy ves - sel frail may strand, Un-less 'tis guid-ed on its way By Truth's un-err-ing band;

To sail . . . a - way! . . . Up - on its changeful tide, To brave the tempest and the storm, And o'er the bill - lows ride.
Then sail . . . a - way! And leave all phan-tom fears, Prepare with strength to meet the flow Of the in-com-ing years.

Though deep and strong the current glides,
Far out upon the sea,
Yet Faith—thy compass—will direct,
And Hope thy light will be;
Still sail away!
Nor trust in thine own power,
But watch and pray though calm the day,
Or dark the midnight hour.

4.
The treasured wealth of patient toll,
Within thy spirit hold;
The shining pearls of Wisdom, place
Upon life's threads of gold.
And sail away!
With Love at thy command,
To buoy thee up, and cheer the way,
To the immortal laud.

5.
Thy finite vision cannot span,
Or bound the mighty deep;
The secrets of the future years,
Within its bosom sleep;
But sail away!
O voyager on the main!
Within the blessed port of peace,
Sure anchorage thou wilt gain.

THE CHRIST.

"I will not ask my neighbor of his creed,
Nor what he deems of doctrines old or new,
Nor what rights his honest soul may need
To worship God, the only wise and true;
Nor what he thinks of the Anointed Christ,
Nor with what baptism he has been baptized.
"I ask not what temptations have beset
His human heart, now self-debased and sore,
Nor by what way-side well the Lord he met,
Nor where was uttered, 'Go, and sin no more.'
Between his soul and God that business lies,
Not mine to caviil, question or despise.
"I ask not by which name, among the rest
That Christians go by, he is named or known;
Whether his faith has ever been professed,
Or whether proven by his deeds alone.
So there be Christhood in him, all is well,
He is my brother, in peace we dwell.
"If grace and patience in his actions speak,
Or fall in words of kindness from his tongue,
Which raise the fallen, fortify the weak,
And heal the heart by sorrow rent and wrung.
If he give good for ill, and love for hate,
Friend of the friendless, poor and desolate,
"I find in him discipleship so true,
So full that nothing further I demand.
He may be bondman, freeman, gentile, Jew,
But we are brothers, walking hand in hand.
In his true life let me the Christhood see;
It is enough for him, enough for me."

BE NOT MOVED.

"Be not moved," we often say,
But who discerns the meaning,
When pressed by trials of the day,
Too small for even naming?
But still they cloud us oftentimes,
Though light is round us gleaming,
We fear the burdens to be borne,
Far greater to the seeming.
But this is conquest; when we're wronged
By incorrect opinion,
To simply keep the way of right,
And wait for its dominion.
M. W., Canterbury, N. H.

CONDITION OF MAN.

WHILE pondering upon man's degenerate state,
His great responsibility—the ultimate—
My spirit groans within me, crying out, alas!
Who, or how many, will be saved at last?
How many willing to pursue the road
That leads to Life, to Heaven, and to God?
Who the mighty warfare wage and win,
The prize obtain, redemption sing?
Almighty Being just, why is it so?
Why so many yield to death, to sin, and woe?
Why turn from Thee away, flinch when trials
Come,
And thus deny the Powers that Be—the Eternal
One?
Why falter, wane, or stumble at the truth?
Why hate the cross of Christ—His life—forsooth?
And shun the only path that leads to bliss,
And covet woe, or mere transient happiness?
Why pleasure seek in pain, and hold the sting of death?
Why fear remorse, yet hug it at each breath?
Why pass along through time, regardless of the past,
Of present moment, or, what their doom at last?
Oh! doleful, doleful sound of Infidelity,
Of nothingness, and want of firm reality!
Beware of this, the poisoned arrow of despair—
The sting of Death—beware of it, O, do beware!
The Tree of Life unfolds its leaves, and teems with love;
This seek, 'tis everlasting and from realms above;
'Tis happiness abiding—bliss without alloy,
Heaven ever present, which nothing can destroy.
It dieth never, fadeth not, nor waxeth old,
But renovates our being, redeems the soul;
It forms anew, makes angels pure of men,
Till Earth and Heaven can together shout, Amen!

A NEW STIMULANT.

A NEW juggernaut, it is said, has been set moving in society, and thousands annually fall beneath its wheels. It is a new stimulant, known as hydrate of chloral—a salt of a burning, pungent taste, having as its basis chloroform, into which it is supposed to be changed in the blood. In small doses it is stimulant and anti-spasmodic; in larger, narcotic; and in excess it produces death as instantaneously as a flash of lightning. Physicians have been variously divided in the opinion of its ultimate results, some recognizing the fearful consequences of its use, others enthusiastically recommending it for ocean travelers as an antidote for seasickness. In England it has taken the place of opium, and chloral-eating is now as decided a vice as opium-eating, hashish-eating and absinthe-drinking. The difference between opium and chloral is that, under the same circumstances, opium is more imaginative, and paints things as they do not really exist; chloral merely increases the power of enjoying the real. A strange, dreamy sense of perfect ease, comfort and happiness takes the place of sorrows and cares; all affection and love are likewise banished, and the eater becomes practically a living, breathing vegetable. An opium-eater has been known to live to a goodly old age. No chloralist can survive three years. The stimulant is imported mostly from Germany, and a high authority asserts, in the London Lancet, that there is positively no antidote for the poison.

KINDNESS.

LITTLE acts of kindness which we render to each other in every-day life, are like flowers by the way-side to the traveler; they serve to gladden the heart and relieve the tedium of life's journey.

Then let us improve each opportunity in performing those deeds of love; for they will bloom like roses in the memory of those for whom they were performed, which will send forth sweet fragrance long after our departure to spirit spheres.

Eunice Bathrick, Ayer, Mass.

FOR YOUTH.

The "evil days (alone) come nigh,"
When youth has been in folly spent;
For ripper years will bring the sigh,
Hearts must o'er wasted time repent.
Dark clouds will ever be too small
To dim the blessed light of God
From those who humbly give their all,
To walk the path the Saviour trod.
As much as fruit exceeds the flower,
Maturity is more than youth,
In excellence of strength and power,
When souls are nurtured in the truth.

Mary Whitchee, Canterbury, N. H.

MONTHLY.

EDITOR.

Mt. Lebanon Col. Co. N. Y. November, 1875.

SIXTY CENTS PER ANNUM.

THE FIRST SHOT.

St. Louis claims the honor of being the first to shoot a materialized spirit.

We have received three numbers of the St. Louis Republican, containing a detailed account of a seance held by W. C. Clark, as medium, but exclusively under the supervision of Henry Timpkins. He had offered the medium $50 for the privilege of shooting the spirit when it became visible. He did shoot it, with a rifle, as soon as it appeared. The cabinet and all its appurtenances were improvised and arranged by Timpkins and the city reporters, the medium's clothes all changed and himself secured as best they could devise. When the seance ended, he was found just as they left him. The money was paid upon the spot, and no one breathes any suspicion of trick or fraud, except the Scientific American, hundreds of miles away in another city and State. It is accepted as one of the most wonderful and unaccountable occurrences of the day—totally inexplicable—except upon the theory of genuine spirit materialization.

Here follows a letter from the medium to the editor of S. & S. and his answer thereto.

St. Louis, August 16, 1875.

ELDER EVANS—Dear Sir:

Inclosed, please find accounts of materialization, through my mediumship. That night, on retiring, I beheld a great light in the center of the room. Out of the light, proceeded a voice, saying, "We have chosen you, as a medium, through and by whom we may be permitted to do great and wonderful works; we wish you to go to Mount Lebanon, for thirty days, and sit with my people, for their development." Thrice, this happened, that night. Next day, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, while sitting in my room, pondering upon the events of the night, I made up my mind, that if, upon its next appearance, I could overcome the awe with which it inspired me, I would speak and question it. Immediately it was present, but it was long before I dared speak. At last I mustered courage to address it, saying, "Are you a Spirit?" Answer—"Yea." "Whose?" "Mother Ann Lee, I am called by the faithful." "What, the Shakers?" "Yea." "Last night you wished me to go to Mount Lebanon; I, being of the world, they would not be willing to have me sit with them." "Write my desire, and they will be more than anxious to have you in their midst." "You know I am engaged to be married shortly?" "Yea." "Should I go, I would want to take my wife with me." "That is our intention; you would not be perfect, in this our intended development, without her." "Would it be wise, in me, to question what this wondrous work is to be, and how I am to proceed in the matter?" "When there, I will impress you whom to choose to form a Circle, sitting one hour each day." "Am I to sit for manifestations, or materializations, while there?" "Nay, we wish to draw a subtle force from you, to equalize the Circle, through and by whom we will be enabled, with others, to manifest ourselves to the world, and teach them the way of life." "By others, do you mean of the Shaker persuasion?" "Yea." "Will this take place during my sitting with them?" "Nay." "How soon after?" "You are not permitted to know; it will be after the death of one or more members of the Circle." "Do I understand that you will be enabled to take on the form, and appear to the world, in such manner, that all, who behold you, will, of a surety, know you are a Spirit?" "Yea." "Shall I let my friends know of your appearance to me, and your desires?" "Nay; none but the lady you are about to marry." "Whom, of the Shakers—as I know none of them—shall I apply to?" "Elder Evans." "Shall I write him and let him know of your communication with me?" "That is our desire."

I have delayed writing, until compelled by some unseen force. I now feel relieved.

Please answer this communication, immediately. Address me at this city; also Dubuque, Iowa, as I may be in that city in a few days.

Respectfully yours,
W. C. Clark.

Mt. Lebanon, August 21, 1875.

W. C. CLARK—Esteemed Friend: Your important communication of the 16th instant is at hand. The Papers also received. Of course, the first question that arises is, Who is W. C. Clark? as I am as unknowing of you as you are of me.

To sit, at intervals for thirty days is a long time. A young married couple would be objectionable, if living in "youthful lusts that war against the soul."

We are of the Resurrection Order. Any Spirit, in or out of the body, who sustains not this Order, if presuming or assuming to teach us, we will, without hesitation, reject.

We do not believe every spirit. They must be tried. See 1st John, 4-1.

I do believe in the Law of Materialization, and that it will be developed among the Shakers. I also believe, that in the world, it will be used as a medium through which many, who marry, will be brought to a practical knowledge of the True Order of Nature—Sexual commerce for offspring only. And to a knowledge of true Celibate Order for those who are called into the Kingdom of Heaven upon Earth—the Shaker System.

I see nothing practically objectionable, except the marriage of the mediums, which may be a trap, or snare, to preach marriage to the Shakers, by authority of Spirits. If that be the covert design, we want nothing to do with it.

We do not live as we do, because Ann Lee did so live, nor would we change, should she be materialized and come among us to subvert the doctrine of the Holy Celibate Life and Order that she established.

You are very welcome to visit us, and when you come, we will do as we feel guided by the Spirit of Truth.

F. W. Evans.

OSKINAWA;

OR TEST OF TRUE MANHOOD AMONG THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.

—o—

WHEN a young man of the tribe arrives at manhood, his father speaks to him, on a day when they are alone together in the wigwam, after the following manner:

"My son, the time has come when you must lay aside your childish toys, together with the thoughts and manners of your childhood and become a man—a man in thought, and a man in feelings and in actions. You must mingle with the elders in council and listen to the words of wisdom spoken by the Ahkeouinze (wise men) of the tribe.

"Bring all your childish playthings—your bows and arrows with which you amused yourself—and cast them into the fire of the wigwam as an offering to the Great Spirit. Then follow me to the forest. I will build you a wahkiegun (house of fasting) in which you must fast many days before the Great Spirit, with your face bowed to the earth. Your face will be painted black, as a token of your childish darkness and ignorance. A cup of water will be placed before you, which will be your only refreshment during your many days of fast. If you persevere, my son, the Great Spirit will surely look down upon you from the windows of his house in the sky, and you must listen to his voice. Do not reject the words of the Great Spirit! Open your ears to them! As the little birds in their nests lift up their heads and open their mouths to receive food from the parent bird, so do you, my son, open your ears to receive the words of the Great Spirit. He will teach you to be wise in speech, when you take your seat in the assembly of the elders. He will give you wisdom, so that even the ancient men of the tribe will bow their heads before you. He will also give you wisdom in hunting the wild beasts of the forest. He will show you the beast of prey that is to be your totame (family name, or badge), of which you will be a mighty hunter before Kejea Manito—the Great Spirit."

The son does as his father commands him. He follows him to the forest. His father constructs a wigwam for fasting. He places in it a cup of water, paints the face of his son black, lays him on his face on the floor of the wigwam, and leaves him to the direction of the Great Spirit.

The son remains in this attitude fasting for many days, praying to the Great Spirit for wisdom and strength to endure to the end of his fast. Many days pass over—some have said they have fasted eight or nine days before the Great Spirit spoke to them from his window toward the south. He tells him wherein he shall excel, gives him words of wisdom to speak by the council fire of the chiefs and elders, reveals to him his totame, and speaks to him words of strength and courage.

The young man arises, returns to his father's wigwam, washes the black paint from his face, and paints it white—an emblem of purity and truth. His mother sets meat before him. He eats and refreshes himself from the effects of his fast. He then arises, goes into the forest and cuts for himself a bow and arrows from a tree to which he has been directed, during his fast, by the Great Spirit. He returns to the wigwam, arms himself with his bow and quiver of arrows, and with his father's blessing, starts off in pursuit of the animal which has been shown him by the Great Spirit. He travels until he has found it. He may have trackless miles of wilderness to pass over, and cross broad rivers and streams, and climb steep precipices, and dig through tangled thickets—still he must not flinch. He must pursue his way until he has found and captured the animal that has been shown him in his dreams. He discovers it—his arrow does not miss—it is the gift of the Great Spirit; he takes it on his back and bears it—a part or whole—to his father's wigwam.

A feast is prepared, the old men of the tribe are called in, the victor's song is sung, and they worship in the dance before the Great Spirit.

From that day he is no longer a boy, with childish thoughts and actions, but calm and sedate, with firm and steadfast step, he walks erect, with his face upward, for he has spoken and conversed with the Great Spirit. He forsakes all his former vain and frivolous companions, and mingles with the wise men of the tribe. He listens to their words of wisdom, treasures them in his heart and shapes his course by them, and so becomes a useful man in his tribe, and after death crosses the spirit prairie and the great river in safety, and finds repose in the Land of Souls.

THE GOSPEL OF COMMON SENSE.

—o—

A PHILOSOPHER has asserted that some people have six senses—adding to the five generally known—common sense. I am the happier for the realization of living in an age when so many may be truly complimented as having in possession this additional faculty, and for finding its influence so weighty, in deciding the correctness or folly of their theology. Ours is an age when people are too intelligent to be satisfied with a theological deduction, because somebody says it is so; and unless it be agreeable to science, to which theology is handmaiden, and unless it will bear the criticism of the gospel of common sense, it is soon rejected.

The gospel of common sense looks upon Jesus as a lineal descendant of perfected Judaism—his mission, the time being ripe, being a progressive evolution into higher life. These admitted, the gospel of common sense questions the propriety of professional Christians adhering to certain practices of the Jews, neglecting almost entirely the superior principles of him whose name they assume. The Jews practiced marriage for reproduction only, this being regulated by law. They were permitted by the same good law to hold private property, except upon their occasional sabbaths, for forty-nine years, when they must begin over again, their landed possessions reverting to the original owners. War, and retaliation, equal to an injury done, were among their other privileges. The prominent advances of Christianity were made upon these principles, which were righteous, in Judaism. Instead of marriage and its consequences, Jesus lived and taught celibacy; and the gospel of common sense asks, how many Christian followers has he in this? Instead of the righteous reproductions of Judaism, Jesus invites to "sow to the spirit," and, with him, join the children of resurrection, who have risen out of the generative sphere into practices quite superior. Jesus taught and practiced community of goods—common property—and the gospel of common sense is surprised that Christians in name are not more generally practical in this respect; but that they rather imitate the Jews, and poorly at that, by miserable families and private property, having no sabbaths upon which to feed the poor, free their slaves, rest their land, forgive their debtors; but abolishing all these, claim as a right, the possession of the land and debtors as mine forever! At all of this retrogression, the gospel of common sense is greatly astonished! Jesus taught non-resistance—peace, love and good will to all, friends and enemies. He was particularly impressive in the prayer he taught, and the sermon on Mount Beatitudes, that his followers should exceed the Jews, by forgiveness of their enemies. Now, the gospel of common sense is astounded, that professedly Christian soldiers torture and kill, not only their enemies, but friends, who have never wronged them, nor given offense! It objects to Christian soldiers carrying guns, bayonets and swords, with which to forgive their enemies. It objects to the impropriety of so-called Christian governments placing the Lord's Prayer and sermon on the mount in the knapsacks, while they refuse their enemies forgiveness until after they have killed them! There are many other things the gospel of common sense would say to professedly Christian people, could they bear them. But I hope these allusions will cause a halt for reflection upon and comparison between the Christian professions of today, the Christian practices of Pentecostal times, and the adherents of all faithful followers of Jesus, practicing THE GOSPEL OF COMMON SENSE.

BERLIN, N. J., August 18, 1875.

DEAR FRIEND EVANS:

A great deal is being said and done in preparation for the Centennial Exhibition to be held, next year, in Philadelphia. Probably a great deal of improvement, in the Arts and Sciences, in the last century, will be shown. But how much advancement, in honesty, justice and practical righteousness, is another question.

As the war of the Revolution, which resulted in our separation from the mother country, was a protest against taxation without representation, how can we celebrate the event without blushing, while half our population are as much slaves to the other half, as were the Colonies to the mother country?

I do not believe in voting. If humanity ever attain to a higher state of society, we will have a different—a better government, in which there will be neither vote, sword, nor gun. So long as our Government is founded on the vote, it seems a mockery to celebrate what we call Independence, while the Feminine Half of our population are classed with idiots and imbeciles. How can we hold a celebration, without shame, while our Government is robbing the Red Men of their lands, and hunting them like wild beasts?

The leaders of the Centennial movement want to have the Indians represented there. Will they not blush when foreigners ask, what has become of the millions of Indians who once owned and inhabited this fair land, and inquire how the scattered remnants of that race are now situated, and how treated by our Government?

On the subject of peace: A whole century of boasted improvement, and our nation in debt more than two thousand millions, for a war among ourselves; with an army and navy, costing from sixty to a hundred millions per annum, in time of peace—except a chronic war with the remnants of ruined red men!

If the leaders of the Centennial movement want honor, let them assemble, as did the Revolutionary Fathers, in Independence Hall, and issue a new Proclamation. Let them proclaim that Women of the United States are entitled to all the Rights and Privileges of CITIZENS; let them declare that henceforth the Indian Race shall be treated as Brothers and Sisters—not as wild beasts; and let them Proclaim, as with the Trump of Gabriel, to all the World and the rest of mankind, that This Nation shall never engage in War—that swords shall be beaten into plowshares, and spears into pruning hooks—and that the people shall learn war no more.

If they will send forth a Proclamation like this, in the true and living spirit of him who, eighteen hundred years ago, on a certain mount, preached Truth, Justice and Peace, then may they hold a Centennial, in which all good Men and ANGELS can rejoice. A Centennial, any thing short of such Proclamation, should end in shame and disgrace.

A Friend to all,

J. Hacker.

CINCINNATI CONVENTION.

—o—

THIS is a primary meeting of public men and women, to consult together upon a plan of reorganization of the Civil Government that shall do justice to all the members of the body politic—a plan that will carry out, more perfectly, the intentions and principles of Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, and their coadjutors.

The Revolutionary Fathers were inspired and raised up to lay the foundation of a Civil Government that should eventually effect a complete separation of Church and State.

God put it into their hearts to hate, without exception, all existing theologies.

In our own time, Lincoln and his followers; Horace H. Day, the famous India Rubber man; Gerrit Smith; G. H. Evans, the originator of the Land Reform movement, who wrote "Vote Yourself a Farm," and published papers and books to the end of his life, advocating the inalienable Rights of Man and Woman, the Owens and their compeers, were also, by the same Spirit, inspired and raised up, to progress and perfect the Civil Government—this being the New Earth, even as the Spiritual—Shaker Order—is the New Heaven, whose founders were inspired and raised up simultaneously with the founders of the American Government. They were cotemporaries, and the two Orders have hitherto run parallel toward the final goal—a true Natural Order and a true Spiritual Order.

The highest kind of inspiration is that which takes hold of the affections and understanding of the mediums, leading them to consecrate their lives, fortunes and sacred honors, to the cause of Humanity, as the purest worship of God.

The monopolizing, fighting, marrying Christians, call these inspired souls—these Saints—in the Natural Order, Infidels; and in the Spiritual Order, Fanatics.

An Infidel is a person false to profession. Not so were the skeptical Revolutionary Fathers, nor the equally skeptical Lincoln, who emancipated the slaves of this Free Republic. That whole class, the first of whom founded, and the last of whom are progressing the American Government, have made the term Infidel an honorable appellation, as the Shakers have redeemed the word Fanatic, by Successful Communism. Fanatic means excessive enthusiasm upon religious subjects, extravagant notions, strange motions and extraordinary vehemence in religious worship. Among Shakers, these have ultimated in practically shaking off many of the lusts of the flesh and mind that still infest Christendom. Our writers put anti before such Christians, and prove, from their history, that it is well put.

Shall we Shakers condemn the Skeptics to anti-Christianity for following our example?

From the standpoint of English Law, much progress has been made by the American Government.

1st. The Public Lands have been proclaimed the common inheritance of Humanity. The People have "Voted themselves a Farm." Any person, of any race or nation, may become an American, and have a home.

2d. Under the Homestead Law, any Citizen can protect a homestead against creditors.

3d. Imprisonment, for debt, is abolished in most of the States.

4th. Woman's Rights in property are secured in part. Her right, as citizen, is not fully secured. Man does the voting, makes and executes the laws—holding woman in barbaric thralldom. In the marriage relation, she has not control of her own person. And "Land Limitation" is yet in the future.

5th. Chattel Slavery is abolished; but War, the root of slavery, is not yet abrogated.

6th. Church and State are partially separated, and liberty of conscience exists, nominally. Theology is still recognized by law—Chaplains in Legislature, Army and Navy, and Bibles in Public Schools—Debts are not yet illegal—Paper Money exists; even a paper house might do good service, until you really need a house.

7th. Privateering on the High Seas, in time of war, is extinct.

Spiritualism, as a force, by which alone the above-named "plagues of Babylon"—Christendom—can be removed, is not yet officially recognized.

In the Cincinnati Convention of original thinkers, individuals, with a mission, can fulfill their mission in a quiet, unostentatious manner. They attend, not as delegates; they represent themselves only—a private assembly.

What meeting could a Believer attend, with a probability of doing more good, in so short a time? The originators of the movement, finding more of their principles in practical operation in the Shaker Order, than elsewhere, asked me to attend, and to nominate some fifteen or twenty others, in different States. How shall the Law go forth, from Zion, to the Natural Order, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem? Daniel legislated for the great Babylonian Empire. Why cannot God raise up Daniels—Prophets—in our day? Are not all the Children of Zion Prophets?

The Testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of Prophecy.

ARIST CRACY OF THE HOD.

This is the best country in the world for men who earn their living by manual labor. This is for all of us a subject of congratulation and pride. The majority must in every civilized community be employed in this way, and the political system which best secures their welfare, other things being equal, may be regarded as best adapted to the wants of modern society. There are men who would prefer to make their living in some other way, and find it very difficult.

A lawyer advertised the other day for a clerk, requesting applicants to state age, acquirements and qualifications. He received in one day over one hundred replies to his advertisement, from men of 20 to 30 years of age, all of whom wrote fair hands, some excellent; all were acquainted with the routine business of a law office; some were attorneys already admitted to practice, graduates of colleges and universities, and in several instances the applicants were also accomplished stenographers. These men asked salaries of from eight to fifteen dollars a week, less than the strikers in front of our building were demanding for eight hours a day of the mere labor of their hands, requiring no intelligence whatever.

It ought to be known everywhere, throughout the country, wherever there are young men hesitating whether they will trust to their hands or their brains for a living, that at this hour, in New York, educated men are demanding the highest and most arduous kind of clerical work at wages which a hod-carrier scorns. The men of education have no organization, no unions which will support them in idleness. They must work or go hungry, and their labor will therefore bring only what employers find it profitable to give. It is an awkward argument to present to the advocates of compulsory education, to show them that learning to read and write drives a man into less lucrative work than carrying the hod.—N. Y. Tribune.

LAW.

THE Law was holy, just and true. What Law? The Law of Physiology—through obedience to which, the God of Israel promised his people that he would take all sickness away from the midst of them.

The Statutes and Ordinances of Moses were given, because of the hardness of men's hearts, being a compromise, between the primary Eternal Law of Right, and the existing habits of the People called Jews—descendants of Abraham.

If it be asked, How could God thus condescend to humanity?—the answer is. Their God was a Tutelar Deity—was God, to them, as Moses was God to Pharaoh. He, it was, who gave the people their request, which sent leanness into their souls—who gave them laws that were not good, and statutes, whereby they should not forever live. "Behold the day cometh that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, saith the Lord. Not according to the covenant I made with them when I brought them out of the land of Egypt."

There was a discrepancy between the primary law, and the law in use. It was the penal law that Jesus was the end of—not the original, everlasting Law of God, which is forever operative in the elements of which all human beings are composed. Of this Law, Jesus said, "Think not that I am come to destroy the Law, but to fulfill it—for I say unto you, that Heaven and Earth shall pass away, before one jot or tittle of Law shall fail,"—the Law that was holy, just and true and good.

THE CURSE OF TOO MUCH PROSPERITY.

THE Springfield Republican ascribes all the troubles which have lately come upon the North Hadley farmers to the curse of tobacco growing. The quick and profitable sales of the best tobacco crops induced these farmers, as well as those in the other valley towns, to discount the future, and accordingly paper was freely given and freely indorsed. The failure of one therefore brought disaster to others. The first to go under was H. C. & A. P. Russell for about $31,000; then S. S. Hubbard followed with liabilities amounting to about $20,000 and E. P. Hubbard for $30,000. Thaddeus Smith failed for $100,000, and his estate is to be sold at auction on the 15th of June. H. C. Collins, President of the Hampshire Agricultural Society, is in the list, and his property has been attached for indorsing Francis Smith's paper, who is also in trouble. L. W. Hubbard's mortgage has been foreclosed, and his place sold. Henry E. Smith will soon be a bankrupt with $20,000 liabilities; the father of the bankrupt Russells will go down in a few days with liabilities for about $30,000 and about $15,000 assets. Edison Martin's creditors have compromised for 50 cents on a dollar. The community is greatly prostrated by this succession of business failures among the leading men in the place. All the bankrupts were principally tobacco growers.

DR. MILLER'S LETTER.

DEAR FATHER EVANS:

I have just returned from an eleven days' visit at the Eddys'. I attended about thirty seances. William went into a new cabinet, placed on the other side of the platform, and on the opposite side of the chimney from the old one. His manifestations were just as good. Saw ten different spirits come out the first night from the new cabinet, one about three feet high and one six feet four inches; all had different costumes on. This settles the question as to confederates. One night he gave me permission to examine his person before he left the platform, which I did thoroughly, even to boots, socks, shirt, wallet and tobacco pouch. That settles the question of his personating these parties by means of masks and wardrobes.

Mrs. Huntoon, a sister of the Eddys, is the best test medium I ever saw. I attended ten of her seances. She shows two and three different spirit forms while she is sitting where the spectators can see her. Your own personal friends, whom you recognize, come to you through her. I shook hands with four spirits in one night. I saw six spirits of my friends in one evening. My own brother showed himself to me, I think fifty times, while I was there, and several times in full form. One night he came out and turned himself around twice for me to view him. The spirits will tune a violin and play tunes at your request, sing songs in chorus of three or four voices, and will talk in audible voices, while the medium is in plain sight of the audience. If she had a cabinet arranged, she could show forty or fifty or more at once, she thinks. We saw as many as four at a time. It is simply momentary, what is seen at this medium's seances. I believe we shall soon get such control of these spirits, that they will do any thing we want them to do. This medium is the one who performed most of the remarkable tests described in Olcott's book as occurring through the brothers; yet Olcott did not mention her name in the book. Her brothers, they say, are jealous of her, and prevent people from going to her seances. If that is so, they will find they are making a grand mistake, for the public will soon leave them and go to her.

There is a good time coming. It won't be long.

For spirit voices are sounding here;
Prepare to greet them, the millennium is near.

E. P. Miller, Bath Hotel,
39 and 41 W. 26th st., New York.

So long as an Organization is possessed of Leaders, who can gather and assimilate Men and Women, who are their superiors, the Organization will prosper. But, when the Leaders can only gather persons, who are their inferiors, the end of the Organization is the time it takes to die.

REPORT OF CINCINNATI CONVENTION.

INVITATIONS had been sent to many persons, and about two hundred responded by signing the acceptance and receiving tickets of admission. Not all came, but it was really a treat to meet with those who did assemble from such divergent points and immense distances. To not a few of them it was a heavy tax upon their resources. Nearly all the States were represented. Upon assembling at the Hall, it was soon apparent that persons inimical to the objects of the Convention—human rights—were in our midst. They were agents of Political Parties who had signed no acceptance nor received tickets of admission. They had crept in unawares, bent upon mischief.

In the evening a meeting was called at another place from which interlopers were excluded. There were both male and female members in the Conference. We had a satisfactory time. The primary ideas that I think will be embodied in a reorganized Civil Government, were stated, discussed and accepted as planks in the New Platform. Who are Citizens? was the first point settled. Are they all men—all women—or are they ALL HUMAN BEINGS? Having ascertained who are Citizens, the next question was, What inherent rights do they possess that should be inalienable? Air, Water, Land—All things needful to human existence, and to render that existence a blessing, was the conclusion arrived at. These are not property, and should not be bought and sold forever. What is property in the New Earth? came next in order. Property is the result of labor upon the natural elements. It is transferable from citizen to citizen forever.

Agreement was reached that no Laws for the collection of debts should be enacted. All debts should be debts of honor, these being uniformly most collectible. Public debts will be voted public wrongs, to be duly repudiated, inasmuch as no existing generation has a right to enslave its successors by mortgaging their patrimony and resources. Let Private and Public pay as they go and owe no man any thing but Love and good will. This will be a means of rendering War impracticable, averting its waste, expense and demoralization. Thus would Slavery and Poverty soon become things of the past. Hygienic and physiologic reforms would correct the errors of generation, in the New Earth, and banish from the New Heavens sickness and disease, therein there should be no more pain.

The second day of the external Convention was spent by those who took part in it, contending with the politicians who had come to capture them. Again, in the evening, we held another meeting of the Conference proper. It was a full meeting; highly interesting; addressed by different speakers—the writer occupying over an hour. There was a noble band of earnest souls in harmony and agreement with the views, ideas and principles presented. The conference lasted until near midnight, and the members parted with mutual gratulations.

Seed was sown that will be fruitful in the future.

MAN can have a proprietary right only in that which he either creates, i. e., makes, or causes to be by his own power; or in what he purchases or receives in a gift through direct and legitimate channels from the first or real owner. Man, therefore, has a legitimate right to the private and sole ownership of houses, furniture, ships, clothing, &c., in short, every manufactured article; but earth, water, and air, are the creations of God only, and no man is able to show charter or deed of gift or purchase from God of a single acre of land, mile of ocean, lake or river, nor a cubic inch of the air we breathe. Use and wont can never sanctify wrong, and our present private ownership of land is just as equitable and no more so than the old British tax upon daylight. John Finlay.

J. M. PEEBLE'S book of Travels Around the World is the first volume of this character that does justice to Brahmins, Buddhists, Parsees and other religionists commonly called "Heathens." He pronounces the morality of the orientals superior to that of Christian nations, and proves it. Drunken Mahomedans are unknown. Human life is safer in Canton, Calcutta, Bombay, and Chiro, than in New York or Chicago. Some of the dervish orders in Mahomedan countries are celibates. The Spiritualism of the Chinese, Hindoos and men of the South Sea Islands is fully described. The work is published at the Banner of Light office, Boston, Mass.

SOUL FREEDOM.

As rolled the mighty river of humanity,
On toward its goal—the ocean of eternity,
I heard a cry, from hearts worn with earth's vanity
Exclaim: "Oh Heaven! (if such there be) our earnest plea
"Is for a knowledge and the power of liberty."
"Not liberty from selfish independence grown,
"Nor freedom shown to galley serfs and slaves alone
"Not liberty that knows no law—where passions roar;
"Nor that corrupt freedom which human hearts
bemoan;
"But that victorious liberty, to sin unknown."

And then I pondered:
From pride, from lust and war, the human heart
made free,
Thence God alone is served with angel purity.
What earthly love and lust-enslaved, humanity
May sing, Divinest love has saved, by Liberty—
By freedom of the soul from all iniquity.
And, as the glorious emblem of civil liberty
Soars far beyond the clouds, in ether's azure sea;
So may the chastened beings of blest humanity
Rise to those holier realms where angel ministrels
Joy in the light and growth and power of liberty.
G. A. Lomas, Watercleft, N. Y.

HEALTH AND DISEASE.

THERE is no one thing that causes so much pain, poverty and distress as bad living and bad doctoring. Learned philanthropists are now consenting that health reform is the basis of all other reforms. We must insist that physicians should begin to preserve health rather than drug to restore it. It is strange that so many have an idea that they can do the latter, but not the former. They can make one well, but cannot keep one so, reversing the common sense maxim that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Strange, that the skill which puts the body in order might not prevent the disorder. Is it not easier to keep the road, than to find it after losing it? Is it wise to let our children contract vices, that we may use our skill to return them to their lost virtues? Is it not easier to keep ten men sober than to reform one drunkard? So must it be as to health. Far easier and far safer for doctors to study, to practice, to teach hygiene—to have all their patrons live in accordance with the laws of health—than to dose them into health when sick? Why not do as one of the kings of China—give the physician a certain sum for every day the family were kept in good health, but nothing for the days this inestimable blessing was lost? Under such an engagement the physician should have control of the diet and other sanitary regulations, which would be far easier, happier and less expensive than his too often vain effort to kill disease with poisonous drugs. Besides, let it be well understood and never forgotten, that disease is the remedial effort of nature to right a wrong; the noble defense against a vile attack; the courageous, loyal rally to dislodge a dangerous foe. For instance, put snuff in the nose, which will be the foe, and the sneeze which follows to expel it is the disease; put the same weed in the mouth, and the saliva flows to wash it out, and, if held in the mouth for the first time, nausea and vomiting are reinforcements to expel the enemy. Swallow indigestible food upon a weak stomach, and the disease of throwing it back comes as a relief. These instances, be assured, soundly illustrate the friendly action of our system against our injuries. The cause of the disease is a foe to be removed—the disease itself, a friend, never to be fought, but always favored. Happily, however, with ordinary caution, a man becomes his own physician. He has but to keep a careful watch over his desires, and restrain the promptings of passions always struggling to be free from the fetters imposed by common sense; to keep the system in a healthy condition, and conform to the hygienic laws which mark the boundaries of health and disease, and he has a certain immunity from pain and suffering.

SEA OF GLASS.

To stand upon a sea of glass, is to become a new creature, dwelling in light.

The natural man and woman are one thing in another, having an outside and an inside.

The heart, of such, is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. Why? Because their inmost thought, imagination and feeling—their own selfhood—are distinct from their outward, whether by looks, dress, walk, or speech. "The poison of asps is under their tongues. With their lips they use deceit." They are not what they seem to be—claim to be.—Life, with them, is a falsehood. It begins with the boy and girl. The sphere of childhood has its under current of craft and finesse—its secrets. Anon, as young men and women, they have a little world of their own; from which the old folks—parents, guardians, seniors,—are carefully excluded. Knowledge—useful information—which might have been imparted, at the proper season, was withheld. That dependence, of the younger, upon the elder, and the confidence created, by a gradual impartation of practical truth, are not sustained.

The love, of the boy, for mother, of the girl, for the father, is, in nature, transferred to wife and husband. It should be normal. Then, when called to forsake all natural relations, for "Christ's sake and the Gospel," the transfer of affections would be possible, the yoke easy and the burden light.

FINGER-MARKS.

A SHORT time since, a gentleman employed a mason to do some work for him, and, among other things, to "thin-whiten" the walls of one of his chambers. This thin whitening is almost colorless until dried. The gentleman was much surprised, on the morning after the chamber was finished, to find on the drawer of his bureau, standing in the room, white finger-marks. Opening the drawer, he found the same on the articles in it, and also on a pocket-book. An examination revealed the same marks on the contents of a bag. This proved clearly that the mason, with his wet bands, had opened the drawer, and searched the bag, which contained no money, and had then closed the drawer without once thinking that ever any one would know it. The "thin-whitening" which happened to be on his hands did not show at first, and he probably had no idea that twelve bours' drying would reveal his wickedness.

Children, beware of evil thoughts and deeds. They leave their finger-marks, which will one day be revealed. If you disobey your parents, or tell a falsehood, or take what is not your own, you make sad stains on your character. And so it is with all sin. It defiles the soul. It betrays those who engage in it, by the marks it makes on them.

These marks may be almost, if not quite, invisible at first. But, even if they should not be seen during any of our days on earth (which is not at all likely), yet there is a day coming in which every sin will be made manifest.—Ex.

THEODORE PARKER—one of the most fearless thinkers of the age—is reported as saying: "There is not now a path, where men walk with ease and safety, which has not been worn smooth, from craggy rock, by the bare and bleeding feet of martyrs."

Such has been the method of all human progress. And such it always must be. As humanity has not yet ascended to the top of the hill, there remains still abundant field for the exercise of that laudable ambition which prompts noble souls to devote themselves to the cause of humanity. Whoever, in this age of the world, devotes him, or herself, uncompromisingly to a life of virtue and usefulness, is no less a martyr—than they, who in more barbarous ages, went to the stake, or the chopping block. E. M.

HOW OFTEN MAY WE EAT?

It has been demonstrated that, at certain intervals, when food is received in the stomach, gastric juice is secreted to digest it, and that no more gastric juice is secreted than is required for the digestion of the proper quantity of food.

If a person eats twice or thrice a day, at regular periods, the gastric juice is secreted by the stomach to digest the food it has received. If, while the food is being digested, more food is introduced into the stomach, digestion, in relation to the food already in the stomach, is arrested. For instance: a person takes, in the morning, a piece of bread and several potatoes; now, it will take about three hours for the stomach to dispose of that food. Suppose the person, about an hour after eating this food, takes a piece of bread and an apple or two; what would happen? The digestion that was going on in the stomach would immediately stop, and not be resumed until the food that was received last was brought into the condition of the first. Suppose he took food every hour, what would be the consequence? The stomach would become prematurely worn out, and could do nothing perfectly—working all the time without rest. But if the person possessed a good constitution and a large amount of vital power, he would not feel, at first, this drain upon his system, but sooner or later he would have to pay the penalty of outraged nature. Some persons have an enormous amount of vitality—good constitutions. It is said of these persons nothing hurts them; they can eat and drink any thing with impunity. This is a fatal mistake.

Science of Health.

THE grasshopper plague in the West has directed attention to the terrible waste and destruction of game that used to be so abundant in the country now afflicted with insects. Formerly, when grouse, quail and other insectivorous game birds were abundant on the prairies, people never heard of grasshopper plagues. They have only been known since the people of the West have indulged in wanton destruction of the birds, so that they might make money by selling their carcasses to the eastern markets. To such a degree has this business been carried on that of late years dealers have been offered high prices for squab-grouse, as a dainty, and the young birds have thus been slain before they had done their part in replenishing the earth. Once the prairies used to be covered with luxuriant vegetation, in which were myriads of grouse; and nobody ever heard then of grasshoppers eating up the prairie grass. The birds had the advantage over them, and ate them up before they got time to lay waste an acre. The birds have now been destroyed or driven away to remote and unoccupied territory, where, of course, they will again be pursued by the gunners, unless the western legislators pass laws by which the destruction of the birds may be prevented and their increase be promoted. The grasshopper is just as dainty to the grouse and the quail as is the measuring worm to the English sparrow, and the way to abolish the annual plague of the grasshopper is to prevent the destruction of all such birds by legally punishing their destroyers.

TIME DEVOTED TO MEALS.

DR. DERRY states that the average time occupied in the process of taking food by the people of Massachusetts does not exceed from twelve to fifteen minutes for each meal. Such haste is injurious to health for many reasons. The process of digestion begins in the mouth with the action of the teeth, and through excitement of the salivary glands by the presence of food. Unless saliva is abundantly mingled with the latter, the first act of digestion is obstructed and nature's plan is changed. The fluid not only lubricates, but acts chemically in the mouth, if a reasonable time is given it, upon all the starchy elements which make up the great bulk of what we eat. Eating in haste a great deal of air is swallowed. Air is to a certain extent always entangled in the saliva and assists digestion, but when "wads" of food succeed each other very rapidly, they act like pistons in the tube leading from the back of the throat, and drive before and between them into the stomach such amounts of air as to distend that organ and impede its functions. Another evil of eating in this way is that the masses of food, imperfectly mixed with saliva, become impacted in the esophagus, checking its muscular action, which is obviously intended to propel one piece at a time. The embarrassment is overcome by taking at one gulp as much fluid as the mouth can hold, thus distending the elastic tube and washing the obstructed food into the stomach. All this is unnatural, and can hardly fail to work mischief.

SHAKERS.

THE Shakers' church was overcrowded Sunday, when Elder Lomas delivered one of his best discourses—upon "True Freedom"—reviewing the various governments, and the growth of liberty today in America. He said "Washington was a father, as Lincoln was a saviour to his country; but back of each was a power that has fathered and saved our loved country, and this will continue so to do while the spirit of our constitution remains in force, and church and state are kept forever apart." At the close he delivered an original poem.—Albany Evening Times.

SHAKERESS.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

ON the first of September, the junior Order of Believers at Mt. Lebanon held their annual social gathering in a beautiful pine grove in Canaan. It was a lovely day, replete with social, intellectual and soul enjoyment. We present to the readers of our periodical an interlocutory discourse in verse, written for the occasion by Cecelia Devyr, Ann Offord, Martha J. Anderson, Charlotte Byrdsall, Melissa Soule, Margaret Cleveland, Catharine Allen, and Elvah Collins, and read from memory. We hope it will be accepted.

On account of its length, we shall be under the necessity of dividing it between the November and December numbers of the SHAKERESS:

PROGRESSION.

CECELIA:

I have a word which I would like to speak;
But now I fear my accents may grow weak,
And that you all may not distinctly hear;
However, I will try to make them clear.
I once in vision sought this hallowed land,
And here I found a happy sister band;
They held communion, serious, glad and free,
But every sentence was in poetry.
I really think they felt just like the Spring,
When she has hid beneath her dewy wing
A wondrous gift of perfume, buds and flowers,
Which she assumes to scatter wide in showers.
Their names are — Martha; — but I wont recall,
If we find her I know we'll find them all;
They gather round her like a flock of doves;
And she in turn each one with fervor loves.
They are the daughters of a noble race;
Perhaps their record you would like to trace;
But here they are, the mystic number seven: —
Come, sisters, come and speak of earth and heaven.

MARTHA:

The subject in its vastness truly awes,
And yet its contemplation gives delight,
We see the workings of Progression's laws,
And hear the voice that said "Let there be light."
The fine and subtle laws of Alchemy
A secret power of transmutation hold,
Touch with refining sensibility,
And bring to light each hidden grain of gold.
Thus, from earth's basis to ethereal spheres,
In pure atomic substance wisely planned,
More sublimated each degree appears,
That forms successive kingdoms, high and grand.
Life's occult forces work with magic skill,
To build anew, 'till earth and heaven shall blend,
Eternal laws of progress to fulfill,
In chain of being that shall never end.
Mark the material forms that round us rise!
They reach their zenith, yield to blight and death;
But spirit hath a growth that never dies!
'Tis life of all that lives, and ceaseless breath;
'Tis spiritual force that guides the suns
And worlds that fill immensity of space!
Electric fluid through each atom runs,
That evolution gives a form and place.
Man — crowning point of the created whole —
The impress of his Maker's image wears;
This microcosm — body, spirit, soul —
Resemblance to creation fully bears,
Each special phase of being, here combined.
The soul and sentiment of every thing,
Is germinal — within the immortal mind —
That yet shall blossom in eternal spring.
By wisdom placed within this rudimental sphere,
To give his noble powers unfoldment free,
His childhood state brings teachers, year by year,
Who spread for him the chart of destiny;
He reads and thinks, he learns and understands,
Aspires still further with a yearning hope,
And lo! his God-like soul expands,
And ever fruitful fields before him ope.
'Tis life progressive, ever on and on,
A glorious resurrection day by day;
'Tis step by step, and starry summits won,
That mark our ever upward, onward way.

MELISSA:

Ann has a thought — I read it in her eyes,
For when I smile she looks so grave and wise —
So, I insist, that she shall spread it out,
And let us know just what it is about.

ANN:

My thoughts have turned with sympathy
To Mother and her band;
I see them in their humble home
In old Oppression's land.
They had to keep a light within,
Though all around was dark,
To war with each Egyptian sin,
To build and bear the Ark.
They had their own strong human hearts
To conquer and subdue,
They had to find the way of life
And prove the Gospel true.
Although their numbers were but few,
Their faith in God was strong,
That He could carry on his work

And lend their souls along.
Though in a land where church and state
Had ever been combined,
Nor freedom to the liberalists
As yet had been assigned,
Still, on the God of truth they felt
Their hearts could trusting lean;
This gave them courage to endure
Each dark and adverse scene.

MELISSA:

Yea, they were faithful to the power
That will redemption work,
They had no dread of clouds that lower,
Or foes that hidden lurk.
'Tis thus, dispelling doubts and fears
Progression finds her way,
And pauses not mid work of years
To count her glories away.
But on, still on, new pathways ope
Through mends and trackless wilds,
Her magic touch inspires new hope,
The earth with blessing smiles.
She waves her sceptre — Science yields
To the electric flow;
Knowledge o'er spreads the nations' fields,
And thence its glory know.
Old superstitions fade away,
Like wreaths of mist at eve,
No more need dark'ning sophistry
The human mind deceive.
Like clouds of death before the sun,
Fell ignorance takes her flight,
For education's beams have won
Their way through error's night.
In vain has persecution sought
To chain, with iron hand,
The power that has so dearly bought
The claims of freedom's land.
It presses through the tide of thought,
And stems the current wrong;
Untold achievements it has wrought
Where tyranny was strong.

ELVAH:

In speaking of progression up through the ages
past,
Can we not some reflection upon home record cast?
The trees, the rocks, the houses and all have passed through change,
And in their latest beauty most happily we range.

MARGARET:

Broad the field of thought and action,
We must labor there to find
Buried stores of useful knowledge,
That would elevate the mind.
O, I feel my soul is lifted
By the work that is for me,
From the trivial and the selfish
I would set my spirit free.
If life's labors seem defeated —
No success their efforts crown —
Was it not the same with ancients?
Bear they not this story down?
Rising, falling — falling, rising —
Marks the journey here below;
But the end will be triumphant,
And the victory we will know.

CHARLOTTE:

Stern repetition's stamped on history's page,
Truth hidden but to brighter, brighter glow;
Each generation finds anew the thorny age,
And learns that life, in its mysterious flow,
Gives strength unto the lowly and the sage.
The scorn of world that hath but little charity,
The desolations of the soul's retreat,
The voice that cries, From sin I am not free,
And hearts that tyranny of home must meet —
Foreshadow dimly of eternal liberty.
But, still expanding, there is joy and hope,
And knowledge often doth unfold her leaves,
While science and religion ever to us ope
The higher lesson that each one receives,
E'er left in error's wilds to lonely grope.
Thus, on and on, as poets oft have told,
Progression has a place in every age;
Her glories in the past and present hold
Their rightful claims upon time's busy stage,
With strength unwavering that cannot grow old.
And, from experience past, our spirits learn
That self-denial is the only guide,
And they, who frailty from this safeguard turn,
Are like the wanderers with no place to hide,
No welcome port where friendly beacons burn;
For faith, that mid the tide and storm is strong,
Is like the life-boat on the ocean cast
That buoys and bears the traveller along,
Unto a home that evermore will last,
Where swells the chorus of the victor's song.

CATHARINE:

Over history's leaves we have backward glanced,
And learned of primitive time,
How material things through growth advanced,
Till touched by the soul divine.
How the pulse of Almighty Deity
Hath throbb'd through the glorious plan,
And wrought, from chaotic elements,
A home and a sphere for man.
We see how truth hath onward marched
Through the elemental wars,
'Neath the dark sky of oppression arched,
And through dungeons' heavy bars;
How the prophets' hearts have been inspired
To teach the higher law,
And how their raptured souls were fired
With the glory they foresaw.
We see the witnesses of God
All linked in a golden chain,
We know the victor's path they trod
Was paved through immortal gain.
We know that the unseen arm of might Still bringeth the victory,

And bears the promise, "There shall be light,"
Till the earth is glad and free.

MARGARET:

'Tis cheering to watch the waves of truth
As they onward, onward roll,
And feel that ever their strength will bring
A victory unto the soul.
We know that the ocean is broad and deep,
And many are sailing thereon,
Yet who of the many their course will keep,
Till the journey of life is done?
The changes and changes we undergo
Have hidden, within their life,
A glory and beauty not always known,
A power that calmeth the strife.
Through trial and blessing, through sorrow and pain,
We learn of progression here,
The greater the conquest, the nobler the gain,
And brighter our efforts appear.
Yet still doth the cry from the suffering arise;
O, when will the struggle be o'er?
For earth will be wrecked in the vapors of death,
Till her people shall sin no more.
Lo, voices come floating from regions away,
Not always in sorrow with time,
For forces are massing the earth to redeem
By the light of the spiritual clime.

MARTHA:

This glorious light has dimly shone
Through depths of human wrong,
And souls have toiled through faith alone
To bear the right along.
Through hope and fear, like struggling breath,
Good seeds have pressed their way,
And life has triumphed over death.
When forms have passed away,
And souls progressed in every clime
War for truth have waged,
While prophecy of future time
Gave light from age to age,
Which showed that human hearts would rise
Above base passion's sway,
And lust of power fall sacrifice
To the advancing day.
A day when new and living thoughts
From mind to mind would flow,
While noble deeds, through them outwrought,
Would aid life's toils below.
And on the annals of the past
We see this truth impressed,
That nothing can defeat the law
By which the race is blest.

MELISSA:

While to the natural world of mind
Progression's truths unfold,
The ideal with the real combined
Her regal forces hold.
How is it with the human heart,
Makes she an impress there?
Does she those hopes and joys impart
Which come through faith and prayer?
For fiery streams of lust have swept
The earth with dead'ning blast,
While germs of good are latent kept
By dregs of sin o'ercast,
And life a mockery is made
To shade discord and woe,
To hide the heavy curse that's laid
Upon the earth below.
And must this be? Is there no gift
To reach the soul of man?
Will nothing from him ever lift
This dark corroding ban?
Yea, free the world of lust and hate,
Those ruling demon twins,
And, in each home and heart, create
The love that virtue wins.
We need reform in social life
To stay the plague of sin,
A deep, a thorough, holy strife
From living faith within;
Till, in the place of crime and vice,
The love of God shall reign;
Then earth will bloom a paradise,
Redeemed from blight and pain.

CECELIA:

Melissa, you would have Reform,
Not tumults by that name,
Not errors broken by the storm,
Reversed, but still the same.

MARGARET:

O, who can solve the problem
Of life so grand and strange,
Or who can see the power
That guides the law of change?
Our life flows out and then returns
Unto the fountain's source,
And still the question is, O, where Lies hid its motor force?

ANN:

That is the question of the Past,
His shriveled lips repeat it o'er,
'Tis heard upon the flying blast,
And in the waves that beat the shore;
The Present asks it in her pride,
And cannot brook the least delay,
Yet its solution doth abide
Within the Future's perfect day;
For as we gain the power of good,
The power of God our minds can trace;
And mystery no more shall brood,
When sin is conquered by the race.

CECELIA:

Now, Elvah, does that meet your mind?
In metaphysics does there lie
A better system than you find
In that concise reply?

ELVAH:

Nay, there does not. But when
We think the spirit-land a mystery,
And ponder o'er the problem unexplained,
So, might we view the nightly stellarsky,
Or deem the humblest soil on which we tread,
For all is strange!

We oft repeat the hope,
We all shall comprehend these hidden things,
When, like the rising perfume of the flowers,
Our souls ascend to blend with spirits there,
In that grand world, the theme for which we live;
And, grander thought, the goal of progress here.
To think is but the imagery of life;
To know, the living motor of the heart;
But gather e'en the knowledge of the great,
And we are humbler than the smallest thing.

CATHARINE:

God is Spirit;
E'en the granite rocks declare that He is life.
On each feature of His glorious Universe,
Indelibly is stamped the great eternal law,
Which works redemptive change to every atom.
Tis action,
The unseen force that harmoniously controls
The grand revelations of existence,
That, with nature's funeral anthems of decay,
Blends glad songs of new-born forms of life;
And, in one vast extended chain,
Links evolving strata of this mundane sphere
With sublimated particles;
And these, with finer, more interior realities,
Converge toward the soul of all created power,
The center of intelligence.

MARTHA:

God's Universe teems with harmonious action,
In grandeur and beauty effectively swayed,
Through order and law without mar or infraction,
Have forces creative their wonders displayed.
My being is thrilled with a cadence of motion
As life in its majesty marches along,
The music of heaven, of earth, and of ocean.
Inspires my heart with a fullness of song.

CECELIA:

Then sing to us, sing to us that inspiration,
Give us the melody, full, rich and clear!
Bound are our hearts to the work of salvation,
To us its music is precious and dear.

ANDANTE.

All hail to the spir - it of beau - ty a - dorn - ing The ev - er green mountains, the low - land and glade,
All hail to the light that breaks forth with the morn - ing, The glo - ri - ous sun - shine and deep sil - ent shade.
Rich anthems of praise, from the glad earth and heaven, Are voiced through God's boundless cre - a - tions of love;
Re - sponsive our song full of joy shall be given, Our earth home fore - shadows fair E - den a - bove.

CHARLOTTE:

O, what were life, if Progression's hand
Was riveted 'neath the bigot's command,
Or made by the scorn of the stolid to stand
Bereft of its noble possession?
The creeds and the dogmas that death contain
Would still in their canting bondage remain,
While the altars of old, where the faithful were slain,
Would sink 'neath their weight of oppression.
The pathway of virtue by martyrs once trod —
The hearts in the conquest of self unto God —
The truths that for victory our feet have well shod,
Would still be unknown and unsought.
The visions of hope from futurity's clime —
The song and the anthem pure and sublime —
The flowings of mind in a musical chime
Could not with our labors be fraught.
The wisdom of life with its interests and arts
Would share with religion the same bitter part,
While the toil of the student could never impart
The weight of his realized aims.
The glory of man, through the culture of thought,
Would back to the past and its errors be brought,
While the growth of to-day, with sorrow out-wrought,
Would yield to the priesthood its claims.
Let the sons of the finances open their eyes,
And the daughters of pride from their vanity rise,
E'er the nation to error and ignorance hies,
And earth of her freedom's bereft.
For over the nation is brooding a power —
Of priestly convention — a black plotting power
That would rob from Columbia her God-given dower.
Thus from Him the nation be cleft.

ANN:

Oppression's rule in church and state
Must bow to nobler claims,
Stern Bigotry and cruel Hate
Be as forgotten names.
In civil and in social life
Shall justice yet be done,
For man will aid the lawful strife
That woman has begun.
Her power for good shall find a place
Where legislatures meet,
And strength, with purity and grace,
With wisdom be replete.
Then monstrous frauds and crushing wrong
From courts of law shall flee,
And earth and heaven will sing the song
Of priceless liberty.
But it is ours here to begin
This mighty toil at home,
That to the standard against sin
True noble hearts may come.
For us are good foundations laid,
For us the streams are cleared,
By efforts which our Parents made
The work of God is reared.

ELVAH:

Those dear old saints could tell us, who've reached the shining shore,
How, early consecrated, they plied the pilot's oar,
Their hairs were white with honor, their aged forms were blest
By rising generations e'er they had turned to rest.
I heard our blessed father, good Elder Richard, tell
Of days when cross and hardship most thickly round him fell.
I think 'twould swell a volume could some historian pen

The pages of his earth-life with pictures now and then.
And some, here present with us, have oft conversed with those Who suffered with our Mother, who has long enjoyed repose.
They hold full many incidents of penury and pain,
Related by these first-born, whose impress will remain
Long after we have passed away and their acquaintance made,
Long after death has borne us where the wicked
ne'er invade.
And now it but remains for us to toil with just such zeal,
To add unto their honest wealth and live for others' weal.
We can but bless their labors here, for we can never know
The many inconveniences they had to undergo.

MARGARET:

Our home is graced with beauty, rare,
With trees, and plants, and flowers,
And all that tends to ornament
In nature's lovely bowers.
Undreamed of new inventions
Unto our hands have come,
To till and cultivate the fields
That lie around our home.
It is the promised dwelling-place —
The heaven begun below —
Sustained by daily action,
Whence wealth of blessings flow.
It is not sordid greed or gain
That makes our home so dear,
But the consecrated labor
Of kindred true and near.

ANIMA

We hear the an - gel music with - in these peace - ful bowers, When all is hushed in calm repose and thoughts of heaven are ours.
Then soft - ly, sweet - ly steal - ing, the ech - o floats a - round, Near, and still near - er peal - ing, we catch the joy - ous sound.
The burden of their song is love, progression and increase. Oh, may this song of ech - oes for - ever whisper peace, peace.

MELISSA:

When we can see the beautiful
Combined with useful art,
We see an impress of the truth
That moulds the human heart.
And this, within our own loved home,
Securely we can hold,
If science, reason, culture, grace
In wisdom here unfold.
But permeating all most shine
The faith, the holy light,
That touches us to live to God,
And read his works aright.

CATHARINE:

From countless stars with golden eye,
From fleecy clouds that float on high,
From the lightning's flash that rends the sky,
And the thunders heavy pealing;
From the wintry storm and the summer's shower,
From mountains grand that upward tower,
From bolst'rous winds that sweep with power,
And breezes softly stealing;
From ancient rocks and mineral ore,
From the mighty deep with its ceaseless roar,
And pearls that strew its shore,
We learn the law of progression.
'Tis written on every created thing,
In the beneficent life of the welcome spring,
And the rich increase which the harvests bring
As the seasons glide in succession.

INFLUENCE.

—O—

"When God sends forth a thunder, let the world beware."—Emerson.

ADVANCED MINDS—pioneers in the work of progression,—have been sent forth in all the ages past, whose thoughts were lifted above the narrow limits of self-pleasing; whose perceptions were quickened, and intensified by inspiration; and they have electrified and aroused the dormant energies of the slumberer, given vivacity to the timid, and new strength and courage to the progressive and aspiring.

All persons exert an influence of some kind in society, varying in character and degree. What that is or shall be, depends upon the moral status and spiritual development of individuals.

The legitimate use of the elements of nature, either of mind or matter, tends to harmonious action, and results in good; but if perverted, great blessings become great evils, in proportion to their misuse. For example, steam power, great as is its utility in civilized life when properly directed, if uncontrolled by intelligence and a knowledge of its nature, is a destructive power. So with human intelligence, if not governed by moral principles, it is a fearful power in society.

We are all affected, more or less, by external surroundings, and equally so are we acted upon by the mind and spirit of those with whom we associate. One person, with discordant feelings and an antagonistic spirit, might engender strife and contention without uttering a word, while a calm, well-balanced, harmonious mind, though silent, would cast a tranquil influence, and the still, soft whisper could be heard—"Peace, be still."

What sensitive mind has not imbibed the unspoken thoughts of others, and been impressed by those with whom their spirits were in unison, even when they were hundreds of miles distant? It is difficult to estimate how great in extent may be the effect of a word spoken or a thought unexpressed, for thought precedes action, and the whole character is formed of individual action. Therefore, we are not only responsible for words which we utter, and deeds that we perform, but also for the cherished secret thoughts—the inmost breathings of our souls—from which are exhalations either pure or impure.

It is said that the air is malarious where the upas grows. Webster says it is a fabulous report, that the atmosphere surrounding the upas is deleterious. However that may be, we would prefer the aroma of the rose and lily, emblems of love and purity, whose secretions are not poisonous like the upas.

If we seek the companionship of the wise and pure, and strive to the best of our ability to help create healthful conditions, by watching and prayer, and repel every evil influence, and place ourselves as humble recipients of all that is good and true—live to our highest conviction of right, without fear or favor—then we shall be as trees of righteousness in the garden of the Lord. The following is a good illustration, given by one of our spirit guides:

"As blades of grass before a strong wind all bend in one direction, the weak in spirit bow before the force of public opinion, while they who are properly developed, and by use have strengthened the innate powers of their souls, are the marble pillars which stand erect, firm and unmoved when the wind and storm beat upon them; having a solid basis to rest upon, they tower toward heaven. Whether large or small, plain or ornamented, they are the same in quality—possess the same properties—and in the sunlight of truth show forth the same glittering beauty.

"In every department of life the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak, and not 'break the bruised reed.' Those who possess a high degree of vitality, and are capable of imparting strength to those who are weaker than themselves, they should give freely, and look to the angel world to have their strength renewed, till all their aspirations tending Godward may culminate in a perfect life."

I would not ask that the diversity of human character be abolished, but that all that is worthy should be improved, adjusted, reduced to order, and be brought into proper action and harmonious relation. Our earthly home should be like a primary school, to prepare our minds for higher spheres—a heavenly home. Our prayer is, Let thy will, O God, be done in thy kingdom which has come! If we labor to this end He will bless our efforts, and answer our prayers.

Emeline Broadway, U. Village, O.

CANDID INVESTIGATION.

—O—

WE can easily comprehend how the infidel mind outside of Church organizations and professed belief in Bible history, may cavil and cry "fraud and delusion," when modern spiritual manifestations are presented to them for belief or even scientific investigation. But when we meet persons who say they believe the Bible records of great signs and wonders, wrought through Moses, as medium, and the so-called miracles of Jesus and the Apostles, unquestioned, because the Bible says thus and so; and when the same or similar phenomena occur in our own time, to find them among the first to denounce and to demand a full explanation why there should be a suspension of natural law to bring about such results, we think that "consistency," when found, "is a jewel" of priceless worth.

We rejoice to know that some scientists have set themselves to work fearlessly to investigate the subject of materialization; and regardless of sectarian prejudice or contumely that may be poured upon them, to give to the world a candid report of the conclusions reached by searching inquiry.

We are a mystery unto ourselves. The atmosphere in which we live and move, while its weight and mechanical forces can be accurately estimated, is entirely imperceptible to our visual organs. We are forced to acknowledge the fact, that the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms increase and expand; because we do not see them grow, does not warrant the assertion that occult forces are not at work to accelerate growth, and perfect each according to its kind.

That the world of matter is only an outward expression of the world of mind, we have no just cause to doubt. We call it the invisible world, because it is imperceptible to the external senses; but when perceived by the interior, spiritual senses, the spirit world is the real world; the material part is the shell—the incrustation—while the spiritual part is the soul and substance of all things.

The long-cherished idea that the spirit world was located far beyond the starry regions, and that they who traveled thence could never more return to earth, is now superseded by demonstrated facts, coming to us by tens of thousands of living witnesses.

The spirit world is all around us. We are surrounded by an ocean of intelligences. This is evidenced in various ways—by rapping, moving ponderable matter, and by materialized forms appearing to many persons at the same moment; speaking audibly, and at times speaking with prophetic power concerning the great work to be accomplished through spirit agency in the not distant future—convincing many skeptical and infidel minds of the immortality of human souls—causing mysterious orthodox ideas of heaven and hell, together with the physical resurrection, to give place to reason and the sense of justice and mercy conjoined; for God, who is infinitely good and wise, will never arbitrarily punish any soul because he possesses the power to do it. But He has fixed laws for all, irrespective of nationality, caste or color, and they who violate those laws mar their own being and make an impress which themselves must remove by compliance with and yielding fealty to those God-given laws.

Spirits from interior worlds are doing a great work! Have not those who have been baptized with power from the resurrection heavens a great duty resting upon them, to co-operate and work with those spirits, in helping to pull down the walls of Babylon, built up of churchal creeds and dogmas, and cemented together by priestcraft, until not one stone is left standing upon another—until people of all nations and languages are convinced that the power that is striving to bear rule is ordained of God? There are many Spirits of various grades at the present time, good, bad and undeveloped, who run with tidings without authority, and who, by so doing, create confusion, and are in reality lying prophets. But they who try the spirits and place themselves under the care and tuition of good angel guides, are nursed with their love and feel their sweet influences distilling upon them as the soft dews of the morning. Such are inspired to believe it is quite as possible to create heavenly spheres and circles here and to draw the bright and beautiful to us, while in mortal form, as for spirits in other spheres—the same in kind if not in degree.

Anna White, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

POTENCY OF LOVE.

—O—

PERHAPS there is no word in the English language more frequently used, or more loosely applied to persons and things, than Love. Abstractly, and scripturally speaking, "God is Love"; and whatever emanates from, and leads to God, is Love.

As there is a natural, and a spiritual world, so there are natural affections and loves pertaining to the material and natural, and also superior loves and affections, which belong to and are placed upon, the spiritual and heavenly. Leaving the perverted, impulsive and passionate, that often pass under the false guise of love, we allow there are two distinct definitions of the word Love—Natural and Spiritual. The natural, which is first, if not distorted by wrong uses, is good in its place—a product of the great First Cause. The Spiritual, refined from earth's alloy—the highest and purest—is the only love that is imperishable; it is an eternal principle that can never fail.

A human soul, devoid of love, is the most miserable, and the most unenviable of all known objects. We were created to love, and the heart is cold and sterile without it; we cannot be happy without the disposition and opportunity to impart and receive love—it is a priceless boon.

It has been said, that "Religion is the cement of society;" and we say "There can be no true religion without love." A community cannot long exist, unless based upon the principle of love to God, and to humanity. All the emanations of God's Spirit are unalloyed Love.

No mortal being hath ever yet fathomed the depth of unselfish love, or tested its power; but, so far as our capacity extends, we have been made happy by contributing, and being the recipients of love. If a companion on the journey of life becomes careworn and weary, and falls by the wayside, or strays from the path of duty, what is so potent to win him or her back to rectitude, and inspire with courage, confidence and hope, as a ministration of true Christian love? Should the chastening rod fall upon the wayward, and their sinful actions meet with reproof, charity and mercy will mark the whole.

Would it not be well for all who profess the Christian name, to consider how much we are actuated and controlled by the spirit of love in our intercourse with others? Are we willing to lift up the lowly, and hold in our embrace the weak and erring, and help them to become strong in the true and good? Are we untiring in our efforts, to reach and warm the hearts of inexperienced youth by the power of love, and thus give them an assurance of enduring friendship?

It is Christ-like to bind up the broken-hearted—comfort the mourner—to give bread to the hungry, and drink to the thirsty. That is practical love. And Jesus said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Mary Ann Cummings, Enfield, N. H.

EXPERIENCE.

EVERY person has an experience in life, which, to the individual, is somewhat eventful and important; but might not be interesting, or of much moment, to others. I would not wish to obtrude my individual experience upon the public; but have often felt, that could my friends in the outside Order, who knew some of my struggles in life to satisfy the demands of my conscience, and obtain peace of mind, also know that I have found a haven of rest, where the turbid waters caused by a sinful life, have in a large measure ceased to roll, it would give me great satisfaction.

One of the Apostles of Jesus stated that "the fashion of this world passeth away." The fashions of the world at the present time may be classed under different heads; but they spring from one root. Pride of wealth, and caste, which finds expression in fashionable dress, is one form. Marriage is the ruling fashion among all classes, high and low—a fashion that does not readily pass away, except by estrangement, or divorce, which oftentimes occurs for the sake of taking on conditions still more obnoxious. Now, in the nineteenth century, church-going and religious profession have become popular and fashionable; but, practically, a nominal professor of religion has no more influence, as salt in the earth, to preserve souls and save from the lusts of the flesh and mind, than a Jew or Mahometan.

I followed those fashions, and sought pleasure therein; but found disappointment and remorse. In early life, I, like many others, had an affectionate mother, who felt great anxiety for my spiritual welfare; and her intercessions in my behalf were strong and fervent. At times, I caught glimpses of the higher Christian life and character, and felt that Wisdom's ways must be peaceful and pleasant. Again, I felt that a worldly life would be more congenial to my feelings. I turned to fashion, and sought happiness in the marriage relation; but found I had sold myself into bondage, and my conscience accused me before God, day and night.

I united with the Congregational Church—was very strict to attend meetings—and reached forth in vain to the professed ministers of the Gospel, for the bread of life; I felt that my soul was famishing for the want of it. I heard of Miller, who preached the Second Advent doctrine. I eagerly caught the idea and believed it possible. New hope sprang up in my heart. I felt that the Spirit was calling me to a more spiritual life, and, by the Second Advent of the Messiah, I hoped to attain it; and I strove sincerely to prepare myself for the event. It is needless to say that I, with many others who sought relief, was disappointed in my expectations. Some went to their farms, others to their merchandise—divided in opinion—troubled in mind.

I was deeply impressed that it was my duty to come out from the world, and be separated from its sinful practices. Many beside myself, truth-lovers and truth-seekers, at that time, became weary of wrestling against spiritual principalities in the churches, and the power of evil in their own hearts, which continuously strove for the mastery, and to bring them into servitude to sinful passions. As there was no living testimony in the popular churches against the doleful works of darkness, I resolved, with about sixty other persons, who were like-minded, to leave the church, believing we could find more protecting power, and enjoy greater liberty of conscience, to be disconnected from it.

My spiritual vision was opened, and I saw that, like Jesus and his Apostles, I must "forsake all for the kingdom of heaven's sake—take up the cross and despise the shame." I felt remorse of conscience, and my spirit was wounded; but the giving up of all for the Gospel—forsaking natural ties and relations, for the spiritual, seemed a hard requirement, and I knew not how to find strength to do it. I looked upon my husband and children, whom I loved tenderly, and felt a struggle.

About that time I heard of the Shakers; I visited them, and found them a self-denying, spiritual minded people—able to minister strength and comfort to my weary spirit; and I resolved to become like them. I had a large circle of friends, who were unwilling to part with me; trial and persecution awaited me. I realized my duty to my family, and desired to fulfill it. All I asked was permission to live according to the dictates of my conscience, for I had resolved to live a pure, virgin life. My husband made fair promises, but did not keep them. Finding that I could not enjoy freedom in that capacity, I resolved to break every earthly band that bound me, and no longer be a slave, morally speaking. I begged for my children to take with me to my new home and friends, unto whom I had resolved to flee for protection from the usages of society at large, which deprive a woman, in the marriage relation of the right to her own person.

I have never ceased to be grateful for my liberation from the bondage of that relation, and that I have found a home, where the bread of life may be obtained, and spiritual waters flow freely to all who seek. And I heartily join in the invitation of the Spirit, through the Prophet Isa, "Ho, every one that thirsteth; come, buy wine and milk, without money or price."

Eliza Dains, Hancock, Mass.

DUALITY.

HIGHLY ESTEEMED EDITRESS: I feel impressed to write my faith in the duality of Deity. As the positive and negative principles run through all the works of the universe, representing male and female elements, I am forced to the conclusion that God, the first Great Cause of mind and matter, must be dual—Father and Mother—the creative and bearing principles, the soul of all things, from whom proceeds life in all worlds. That we are created in their image and likeness, I have no doubt; and that all good things, temporal as well as spiritual, were produced, directly or indirectly, by them, as blessings and gifts to be used for the well-being and happiness of mankind, I firmly believe.

The orderly arrangement in the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms, never were conceived and brought forth, except by the harmonious action of the Allwise Father and loving Mother, whose dwelling is in the high heavens, but whose watchful care and kindness extend to all the works of their hands. To them all honor is due whence genius, talent, art and science are derived.

Through the mediatorial agency of Jesus the anointed and first born Son in the Christian era, and Ann Lee, who was also anointed to be the first born of many daughters, we have received a revelation of the duality of Deity—our Eternal Parents. By being baptized with the Holy Spirit, as they were, and walking in their footsteps, we also may become rightful heirs in the kingdom of peace and (in our degree) saviours to other souls.

Only by obedience to truth can we possess this heritage with the chosen heirs of light in the completed order of male and female, whether we are led through the deep waters of affliction, or through fires of persecution, if our faith is in God, and our confidence in our spiritual guides, we shall be enabled to overcome seemingly insurmountable obstacles which may appear in the way; and should we be left to cry in bitterness of spirit as was Jesus, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" we shall be sustained as he was, and finally find peace and rest to our souls. There is no rest like that which comes from God—our Eternal Parents.

FULL SALVATION.

—O—

THAT the soul is immortal need not be questioned. Soul has been defined, the spiritual, rational and immortal part of man and woman; Life, the vital principle. Then, according to reason, the rational part of our being cannot rest in a dormant state; it must be aspiring to elevation, or be degenerating.

We possess dual powers, and capabilities—natural and spiritual. The tendency of the natural, unaided by the spiritual, is downward, toward the animal and sensual; and would lead back to Egyptian bondage, heathen mythology, and even lower than the brute creation. But God, in love and mercy, hath given us light, to discern the "way of holiness, cast up for the ransomed of the Lord to walk in;" and hath raised up Christ Jesus, to be our great Leader, in the male Order, and Mother Ann, our example and Leader in the female Order. Now, indeed, hath light come into the world; and they, who no longer "walk after the flesh," to fulfill its desires, and reap its corruptions, are not bound in darkness; but they live in the spirit, and dwell in the light of life.

Those who have commenced to travel the highway of holiness, find, as they progress, that light shines clearer; and the power to lift fallen and erring humanity above the low plane of nature, increases. Thus we are able to put on Christ, by being baptized with the same spirit, and are no longer subject to the will of the carnal mind; we may be clothed with pure robes of righteousness, as were our Gospel parents, and like them, rise from day to day in newness of life, and feel that our souls are elevated above the sensuous, by being cleansed from all impurity.

How can the heart be refined, except by culture—by destroying noxious, poisonous weeds, and nourishing the good and choice plants in the garden of the soul? Impure thoughts are like "little foxes that spoil the tender vines." We should learn to take those little foxes—impure thoughts—before they take form in actual deeds. If we judge our own hearts, truly, we shall not be judged—condemned.

By obedience to true principles, we shall be made free from earthly bonds and fetters, and be fitted to enter mansions of purity, prepared for the Saints of God, when called to lay aside the mortal part. Thou wilt the immortal spirit rise triumphant over death and the grave, and progress onward and upward, in our eternal home.

EDITORIAL CHANGE—SUMMARY.

—o—

THE sixth volume of our paper will commence under the direction of its original editor, G. A. Lomas.

With much satisfaction, we vacate the chair, in behalf of our worthy and able brother, believing he will continue to maintain sound doctrine, have no fellowship with unfruitful works of darkness, and by The Shaker, shake all, in Church and State, that can be shaken.

The Shaker and Shakeress has been well sustained by its inside and outside friends. Thanks to all contributors, and to the press for its uniform courtesy. Extracts from its columns and kindly notices attest the urbanity of editors. Without an exception, they have been gentle toward our little waif.

As the S. & S. is the first dual paper on record, may we not assume this generous reception and treatment of it as a prophecy of unanimity in adopting the coming Dual Civil Government, to be formed in likeness of the Shaker Order, in which it will be understood that it is no more good for man to be alone, in framing and executing the laws of a government, for people of all nations, kindreds and tongues, holding to 1,000 different theologies, than it is for man to be alone in the construction of a family.

As the Union has freed colored people from slavery, so will it free woman from semi-bondage, and endow her with a citizenship that Rome, in all her glory, never dreamed of.

The Shaker is a little body with a great soul. Its means are small—its aims high—nothing less than the destruction of anti-christian Babylon—confusion—and the construction of a true Christian order, from whence shall proceed an influence and a law, that will organize, out of the American government, a new millennial earth. It is in this manner that the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ.

Such nations will learn war no more. The organic wrongs of the then existing governments of earth, and the primary, abstract truths, seen in the light of the Christ-Spirits, by the Prophets of the Ages, caused them to be as pilgrims and strangers, seeking a city having the continued revelation of truth as its foundations. "Cease to do evil" is now in order, for individuals, and for organizations.

In the present light of the retiring editor, seven forms of evil are apparent, in individuals and in organizations.

INDIVIDUAL EVILS.

1st. Superfine Flour, divested of its bran, causing general derangement of physical functions.

2d. Flesh Meat, necessitating the killing of dumb animals, who cannot plead their own rights. Its use, under the Darwinian law—"struggle for existence and survival of the fittest"—is not spiritual, but muscular force and mental craft—practical deception.

Aboriginal races, who fight with and feed upon wild beasts, themselves become wild.

3d. Spirituuous Liquors. These madden the brain, leaving the man unmanned—the reason dethroned—the conscience seared.

4th. Narcotics. Opium, tobacco—types of a numerous class of nerve-destroyers, eagerly sought and recklessly used by a large proportion of mankind.

5th. Condiments. These help in the work of physical deterioration, directly and by inheritance, in destroying the natural taste of all articles to which they are applied, and also by creating unnatural appetites and tastes. Salt, pickles, pepper, mustard and vinegar can be applied to the land, without much damage to health.

6th. Teas and Coffee are types of a large class of plants that furnish drinks to the female portion of humanity. They may be vainly used, but are not used in vain.

7th. Foul Air. This is one of the curses that Moses said would cleave to his people, if disobedient to his laws and statutes. How universal this plague, and what dire results follow breathing impure air and drinking impure water are problems that the science of the world is now engaged in solving and devising means of avoiding. The people of God should be as clean in the air they breathe, as in the food they eat, the clothes they wear, or the houses in which they live.

SOCIETY EVILS.

1st. Holding land, as property, forever. The accumulation of "broad acres" in the hands of persons holding it from general use.

2d. Poverty, resulting from people being cut off from their inheritance in the earth. The promise is, The saints shall possess the earth, each sitting under his and her own vines—No poor.

3d. Wars. Bread or blood is the cry of the landless always and in all times. The landholders give them both bread and blood. They cause them to earn their bread by shedding the blood of each other. When the Romans had no national wars, they made the landless kill one another, as gladiators.

4th. Slavery of the conquered is a logical deduction from war. Death to the vanquished is its law, unless self finds use for the doomed wretch as a slave to minister to the lusts of the heroic conqueror. Slaves are the highest form of property known to Christian (?) law.

5th. Masculine Domination. This is an organic evil in all old creation organizations.

The desire for women modifies the Darwinian law of brute force in man; otherwise, under that force, man would kill all women. Her lord and master's passions balance each other.

6th. Usury. This eats, as does a canker, into the vitals of the producing classes. "Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not take usury of any," was Jewish law.

7th. Spiritualism, the science of all sciences, being pervorted under the operation of the above-named evils, creates a theology that stultifies reason, confounds logic, and attempts the regulation of conscience, by physical force, torturing the body for the benefit of the soul. Thus we have a union of generation and Christianity—Babylon—mixture—producing Church and State organizations, in all nations—except under the to be New Earth Government of these United States.

VICARIOUS ATONEMENT.

—o—

In the doctrine of vicarious atonement, God is represented, first, as inflexibly just; second, as changeable, his wrath being changed to love by the vicarious sacrifice. His justice and his mercy are arrayed in conflict. God's mercy pleads "spare the culprit;" justice is inexorable, and will not yield one iota to the pleadings of mercy. Punishment—vindictive punishment—must and shall be inflicted on the sinner, or on the substitute. God's children are required to imitate him. Here God is represented as having conflicting dispositions. Transfer this state of mind to a human being, and you have drawn the picture of a miserable, unhappy wretch. Again, justice and mercy are attributes of God, and, like him, are unchangeable in their relations one with another, whether they exist in or are exercised by God or man. The moral effect, then, of such a conception of God as this doctrine inculcates is the following, when exhibited in man: His servant, or subject, disobeys him; the culprit must be vindictively punished. If there be any of the milk of human kindness in this lordling's nature—any mercy—it must be crushed out, annihilated. Inexorable justice overrides and quashes all mercy's pleadings. It might as well not exist; it can have no influence. "There is no room for mercy, none for pardon left." Thus man, in imitating his God, becomes a perfectly remorseless tyrant. If now he undertake to make the dodge attributed to God by this vicarious doctrine, and take his innocent son as a substitute for his erring servant, and pour out the rage of his wrath upon the innocent son in order to satisfy the vindictive demands of his justice, does not every one see that he still more outrages all the principles of eternal justice instead of satisfying them? The doctrine carried out frustrates its own professed end, and is a flagrant exhibition of gross injustice. There is not a civilized nation on earth which would not punish a man, capitally, for immolating his innocent son, because some of his servants had offended him. Yet all the orthodox and evangelical sects of nominal Christians do, in their creeds, charge the God of heaven with the commission of this diabolical crime.

A modern author, writing of Calvin and Calvinism, says: "Hatred of sin was fixed upon the sinner. The burning indignation of his offended conscience was seldom tempered with mercy. JUSTICE, dark and frowning JUSTICE, streaming with implacable vengeance; JUSTICE omnipotent and impatient of execution; JUSTICE, the divinest principle in the constitution of the mysterious trinity; JUSTICE, the unchangeable grandeur of God's intellectual character; JUSTICE, the support of heaven and hell; I may add JUSTICE, the frigid climate of kingdom come, the savage feature of the Calvinistic theology, the refractory attribute within the heart of destructive combativeness, is the pet principle, the central idea—the indestructible motive power of cruelty in mankind." Again, the same author says: Millions have accepted Jesus, not as an elder brother and member of the human family, but, on the contrary, that Jesus has been apprehended and outrageously martyred as the sacrifice of an infinite mind, a lamb slain on the bloody altar for human benefit; a debt-payer of that which he did not owe, suffering for gigantic and innumerable sins he never committed, transforming, to angels of heaven, great world-worn sinners, because they merely "believed on Him and were baptized, and have accepted a mountainous mass of other absurdities and heathenish contradictions."

CONCLUSION OF A DREAM.

A few days after writing the above, I dreamed of preaching a regular discourse to an audience on the subject of Vicarious Atonement, of which the following is the concluding part: According to this doctrine of imputed sin and vicarious atonement, Adam's original sin was imputed to the whole human race. This sin against God, thus attaching to the race of man, is so stupendous, so heinous, that God cannot extend mercy; cannot forgive without violating eternal justice. Man, thus lying under the guilt of this tremendous criminality, with the sword of offended and implacable justice lowering over him, nothing daunted, audaciously adds to his already unpardonable sin one still more horrible and sacrilegious. He commits Deicide! Seizes and murders God's own innocent Son! the second person in the trinity! This additional and awful outrage, it is said, satisfied God's eternal justice, and opened his bowels of mercy to man. But really it would seem more as if the Omnipotent was intimidated, his eternal justice conquered, and his mercy extorted, than that he should, for this new offense, now become satisfied and reconciled to the human race.

"BLOOD OF THE LAMB."

"And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony." Rev. xii, 11.

THERE is a deep significance attached to these words, more so perhaps than the generality are aware of, especially those who expect to be saved by the blood of the Lamb; without living his life and overcoming the world in themselves, as he did, and adding to that life the word of their testimony. John, the forerunner, said, after baptizing Jesus, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." John, i, 29. How did he "take away the sin of the world?" By bearing a daily cross, and overcoming the world in himself, i. e., all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life. A trinity, as the apostle Peter said, "leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps." Impossible! says one. Impracticable! says another. He was God, and no mere man, since the fall, can follow the example of a God, nor keep his commandments; but doth daily break them in thought, word and deed. This antichristian idea has long since been exploded. The blood of the Lamb here spoken of, is the life of Christ; the blood is what constitutes the life of every human being, physically, while in the form. "The blood is the life thereof." What constituted him the "Lamb of God," spiritually, was the purity and innocence of the life he lived, and the Baptism of the Holy Spirit, into the work of regeneration, being led by the Spirit of God. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God," the same as he was.

Nor did he take away the sin of the world by living a life of righteousness himself, and imputing that righteousness to others. In addressing his disciples, he said, "except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven." If a dependence on the righteousness of Christ was sufficient for salvation, why did he not say to his disciples, never mind about your own righteousness, mine is sufficient for you in all cases? It would be conflicting with God's attribute of justice, to punish the innocent and let the guilty go free. It is an immutable law, "he that doeth wrong must suffer for the wrong he doeth," whether it be moral or physical, and no blood of lambs or goats can make it otherwise. But "he that doeth righteousness is righteous even as he is righteous."

But, says one, would it not do as well, to live the life and omit the testimony? We think not. Where the testimony is omitted the life is lived, only in part, as a general thing. They have to go together. "I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil," said Jesus; i. e., the world. Let any try it, and see if they do not find, by experience, an increase of moral power over the world, the flesh, and the devil, if there be one, and I believe there is—not a black personal devil, but that old lying spirit—slanderer. "The accuser of our brethren and sisters is cast down, which accused them filisely before our God day and night," and they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony."

Elder J. S. Prescott, North Union, O.

WORLDS WITHOUT END.

WORLDS ad infinitum. We like the idea. It opens a field for change ad infinitum—eternal progress.

Advent into the first world is not inaptly symbolized by the entered apprentice's degree in masonry—we go it blind.

Advent into the second world is like the fellow craft degree—we are but half hoodwinked, not half satisfied with the wisdom or knowledge gained. No inconsiderable percentage of the vast amount of raw human material that takes the first degree in the scale of semi-conscious being, would, apparently, be semi-content to linger, and so of those who take the second degree.

Not so with aspiring minds. Excelsior is the motto inscribed on their banner. They are not content with human moteties, nor with ill-assorted, vulgar fractions. They want to see humanity in its entirety—in whole numbers—integers.

To attain the desideratum, a searching ordeal must be endured. We must be put through the land of shadows—the camera obscura. This is a lengthy process. The soul will be tried to the extent of human endurance. In this crucible we must continue, till no dross remains; till the Son of Righteousness can shine through us, as clear as crystal, casting no shadow on the canvas.

Now are we prepared for an advance movement; a movement that is a movement. We enter a world where man is found in the likeness of God. A world where the brief Mosaic poetic epitome of the creation of man is, to some extent, actualized. We say, to some extent, for there is really no end to the worlds. Every world we press through will be accompanied with corresponding elevations. To the increase of glory there will be no end. World after world will appear in view, each, in turn, holding out inducements worthy of our loftiest ambition. The time will come, the condition be reached, in which we can appreciate the justice and the wisdom of God, in conferring on us conscious existence.

In the first, and in succeeding worlds, much may be accomplished by earnest minds, preparatory to an early advance movement. We have splendid opportunities here and now—opportunities not to be trifled with. No experience in scenes, no matter how trying, which may not be made available in coming worlds. This should reconcile us to endure the disagreeables of life in the present world, be that life long or short. Glory, honor, immortality, are before us as inducements to endure the cross and despise the shame of our juvenile ignorance. We are living for eternity, for God and humanity.

Oliver Prentiss, Mount Lebanon, N. Y.

DO GOOD.

WHAT we do is ours, together with the ultimate fruits of the same; let whoever may receive its immediate effects. How many have been awakened to feel conviction for sin, that have afterward felt they had fallen from grace, or committed the unpardonable sin! And have not many, through ignorance or false teaching, thrown away hope, and set darkness and the pit before them as their sure doom, and recklessly plunged headlong into temptation and crime? This is either making work for many days of repentance, or heaping up fuel for the unquenchable fire. In all the revelation of God there is nothing to discourage doing good at any time or under any circumstances, even by those who may suppose themselves irredeemable, but who are quite the reverse.

The following text of the prophet is sometimes misapplied: "When I say to the righteous he shall surely live, if he trust to his own righteousness and commit iniquity, all his righteousness shall not be remembered, but for the iniquity that he hath committed he shall die for it." The simple meaning of this is, his former righteousness shall not save him from punishment as the wages of iniquity, if he consent to practice it. In like manner, if an unrighteous man repeat and turn to righteousness, correct his errors and right the wrongs he has committed, his former transgressions shall not prevent his reaping the fruits of his righteousness.

Jesus testified that whosoever would give a cup of cold water only, to a little one who followed him, on account of his being a disciple, should in no wise lose his reward. In the judgment work of separating the good from the bad, those who have fed and clothed the least of Christ's brethren and sisters, or visited them in sickness or in prison, unwittingly did it to him, and are invited to an inheritance in the heavenly kingdom. While those who merely prophesied (i. e., taught) in his name, and in his name did many wonderful works, but omitted these deeds of mercy and charity, are commanded to depart. If to every one shall be given "according as his works shall be; whether they be good or whether they be evil," surely none can fail of a recompense for what unselfish good they do, even if they fall under the judgment of condemnation, to expiate their folly and guilt by suffering. But when they are sufficiently broken to acknowledge the justice of the hand that deals with them, they will realize that their deeds of self-sacrifice have mitigated their sufferings and made repentance easier; while every wicked deed, willfully committed, will aggravate their torture. This is according to reason and justice, and is confirmed by the testimony of some who have experienced a measure of the same. If "every idle word" shall meet us in the judgment, or Balance of Justice, Mercy, Reason, Justice, and Revelation, all assure us that every positively good deed will be there also.

Truth clearly affords all encouragement to do good, even to the last moment of probation. All discouragement proceeds from falsehood. "Do good and lend (or give), hoping not to receive as much again, and thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." But those who are prompted by mercenary or selfish motives in all they do, may look in vain for any future recompense of righteousness. Let those who suppose themselves irretrievably lost set about doing good to their neighbor, whether stranger, friend, or enemy, hoping not for earthly reward, the only way souls can prove their love to God, and if they abstain from all willful and premeditated evil, who can say the good will not so far prevail in their day of reckoning, that they may finally secure a part in the first resurrection. Certainly such deeds, particularly those done for the household of Christ, will be of more value to the doer, whether saint or sinner, than all earthly pelf and pleasure.

The Revelation of this Day teaches "Never throw yourselves away—Though you be fallen never so low, it is not too late to cry to God—A soul in the belly of hell can do no better than cry to God." But some will say "The prayer of the wicked is abomination to God." True! when they do not pray sincerely. Souls cannot pray to God while seeking to save their carnal lusts—or to be sanctified in their sins. Their prayers ascend not above carnal pleasure, and are answered by "the Man of Sin," who sitteth in their temple and sheweth himself to such that he is god. Their eyes, blinded by impurity of heart, cannot see the real and living God.

So of the proud, whom "God resisteth," and the selfish and self-willed, who pray to be saved in their own ways, and to have their own wills executed; God "beholdeth them afar off." But "In our humiliation our judgment will be taken away, and in no other way." Every honest, humble seeker is indeed blessed; for the Holy One who inhabits eternity dwells with the humble and contrite heart, to revive the spirit of the contrite ones. "I am come to seek and save that which was lost—the whole need not a physician," is the language of the Good Shepherd.

Abonzo Hollister, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

JESUS.

ACCORDING to historical accounts, Jesus was a man of symmetrical beauty, in body and mind. He was clothed with wisdom, in harmony with Nature's laws, in sympathy with suffering humanity, and ever ready to forgive the erring, especially his enemies and wicked or ignorant persecutors. He seemed to possess an intuitive knowledge of the ruling elements of the lower world, which bring misery, pain and sorrow upon mankind; also of the laws which rule the heavens, which, if kept unbroken, produce happiness and joy.

He was physically and morally sound, well developed, qualified to comprehend the needs of the human family, and the causes of their misery, and was pre-eminently prepared to receive the Christ-Spirit, to show, by example, how to make an end of sin, finish the "mystery of godliness," and the misery which is the fruit of ungodly deeds. He occupied such an elevated position that he comprehended the proper sphere of all inferior creatures, their powers and imperfections.

When I compare myself with the standard that Jesus raised, the contrast is great. As I understand, he was born of the best morally cultivated, religious Jewish parents. I have no such claims. I was of humble birth; my parents were Gentile, and I was reared in inharmonious relations and irreligious surroundings.

But I am what I am to-day, and hope, by the grace of God, and the aid of good Spirits, to be something more and better in the future, if I persevere in walking the path of purity and doing the works of righteousness. By engaging in the Christian warfare, and fighting all the lusts that war against the welfare of body and soul, I expect to find redemption from sickness and physical disease, as well as spiritual sins, and the effects flowing therefrom.

I crave the power that Jesus possessed in body and soul. "The truth made him free, and he was free indeed." He was a pure medium through whom Divine inspiration flowed freely from the inner heaven of heavens.

To attain unto the same knowledge and goodness, and in my measure to be as he was in this world, shall be my highest aim.

RESIST NOT EVIL.

—o—

How important to our spiritual welfare and progress, as Believers, that we seriously and carefully consider the true import of the words standing at the head of this article—the beautiful injunction of our Saviour—"Resist not evil, but rather overcome evil with good."

This will often give strength to curb and control the angry tide of passion that might otherwise mar the peace, and sever the bonds of gospel union. Though maligned and persecuted by others, we should ever cherish as sacred the blessed precept inculcated by the founder of Christianity, to "return good for evil."

Nothing brings a greater cross upon the natural disposition, and costs a greater amount of self-denial, than a true application of this principle. By it we gain a conquest over the lower nature, but it is only accomplished by earnest and continued struggle. If amid the trials and temptations of communistic life, we allow a harsh or unkind word to escape our lips, how easily we may wound the sensitive feelings of a dear brother or sister, and mar the harmony of the social circle, where naught but Christian love, and the spirit of peace should reign. If this be done, much of the highest enjoyment of life would be sacrificed through want of proper and timely consideration, and the wisdom that is from above, that teaches the important lesson: "first pure, then peaceable."

We have been called by the spirit of Christ to renounce a worldly life, and unceasingly to pray that we may possess true charity, to "forgive as we would be forgiven," to "be kindly affectioned one toward another;" and to arm ourselves beforehand, that, when temptations assail, we may have the power of resistance, and faith to buoy us up and bear our little bark safely above the waves of discord and strife, where the turbid waters of passion never roll.

We shall all prove our sincerity, and evidence, by our daily life-practice, whether our professed faith and works agree. If we cultivate and grow all the lovely spiritual graces of the gospel, we shall be shining lights to the world, and beautify the fold of Zion. Thus by nobly striving to attain unto the highest perfection of human character, possible in earth life, many will bless our efforts, and we hopefully trust, will be induced to do likewise. What is so beautiful as to see brethren and sisters dwelling and toiling together in bonds of unity, cemented by holy angelic love and affection, striving to promote each other's happiness and welfare in all things temporal and spiritual.

I thank God for the priceless knowledge of the way of life and salvation through the medium of Divine revelation, enabling all who will strictly follow the light that shines, to gain power and victory over every vile passion, and bring them into reconciliation with God and his angels, and with their brethren and sisters. Such, whether on earth or in spirit-spheres, will be numbered with those "who have come up through great tribulation, and having washed their robes and made them white in the blood," or by living the life of the Lamb, their names will be exalted, and enrolled in the book of life.

"THINGS NEW AND OLD."

—o—

EXTERNAL things are perpetually changing. In the universal laboratory, there are combinations and decompositions of elements constantly succeeding each other, all under the direction of the Supreme chemist, and all tending to one end—the production of the greatest good for the individual man, and the ultimate harmonizing of all minds with the Divine.

Why, then, it may be asked, the need of bringing up any thing from the past, since the present must be so much superior to it, and what is to succeed the present, will so much surpass it? Why should the magnificent edifice of to-day be reminded of "the rock from which it was hewn?" Because, the future can only stimulate hope, while the past and the present alone must be our instructors, and can alone prove what the future shall be. All that has been learned has been learned in the past and the present. "Day uttereth speech unto day, and night sheweth knowledge unto night." The products of to-day show us how fertile the past has been. All human beings, whether existing upon the unnumbered spheres of the outward universe or in the spirit realms, differ from each other only as they contain within themselves more or less of the accumulated treasure of the past. "Who hath despised the day of small things?" or rather, who should despise it? Without it, there never could be the day of great things. The new things of to-day are but the natural growth of what were planted yesterday. The rains of yesterday fertilized, and the rays of yesterday's sun warmed them; so that we owe to the growth of yesterday, the fruits we are enjoying to-day.

But are there not productions of the past that are to be avoided? Most certainly. Not every combination of elements produces what will sustain life. On the contrary, much that is produced will destroy it. There is need, therefore, of discrimination. These are to be classed among the things that are behind which we are to forget, while we press toward the attainable things before us.

Past experience is a lesson for to-day and a prophecy of the future. We know from the twig before us what the tree shall be. So we trace back, through centuries, the tree of to-day to the sapling and the twig of the past. From the ruins lying before us, we judge of the extent of the once existing city, the material of which its buildings were constructed, and, in some degree, of the character of those who once inhabited it, though no record of them remain. That which was once the Church of Christ, though now incumbered with heaps of rubbish, yet has enough to show, aside from the records handed down to us, what was its original foundation, and how much the present superstructure differs from the model exhibited by its Architect.

But it is not enough that the past be restored. The second temple, though resembling the first, must surpass that in beauty and glory. The sciences of to-day resemble those of by-gone ages, yet how vastly superior to them! "Truth is truth wherever found," yet to-day we behold the flower in full bloom, where those of other times beheld only the closed bud, the growing stem, or the just expanding seed. Revelation is a perpetual unfolding, both in the individual soul, in the national life, and in the life of the entire race of man. Hence, it is a perpetual necessity. One of olden time has said, "There is nothing new under the sun." Eyes he may have had, but the past was to them a sealed book, and the present shed insufficient light upon his vision. His great kinsman of after ages was far wiser than he—"a scribe perfectly instructed in respect to the Divine government." What patience, what trust in the future he manifested! This was the lesson he had learned from the past, so that though the flesh shrunk from the trials before it, yet the spirit with unbounded confidence in the future, could say, "Thy will be done."

The perfect lesson we have to learn from all our experience is, that the Divine Mind is unchangeable. It sees the past and the future with unerring certainty. We need intimate connection with that which cannot err, so as to be assisted in our judgments respecting the past and the present; and a perfect reliance upon him with whom is "no variableness nor shadow of turning," in order to possess that equanimity of soul which all the changes of earth, whether in its physical elements or the moral condition of its occupants, cannot disturb.

COUNT THE COST.

—o—

I MARVEL, when I contemplate the condition of the present generation of men and women, to see in how many ways they seek happiness—regardless of the future—at the expense of the soul's welfare. How important it is that children and youth should have the right discipline in early life, that they may understand how to form correct habits. And those of mature age should bear in mind that it behooves all who take upon them the Christian name to "depart from iniquity," for name signifies character. The followers of Christ must be like him; bear his cross, wear his yoke, and walk in his footsteps.

For this reason all should count well the cost before they undertake the work; for, although the land of the redeemed is full of blessing and ineffable joy, fallen humanity can never attain that state of blessedness, except through conflict and struggle. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

The true way to trust in Jesus is to have our life correspond with his life; if his deeds were meritorious, let ours be meritorious also. If he was a son of God,—"the first-born of many brethren"—"to as many as received him,"—in his true name—character—"to them gave he power," also "to become the sons and daughters of God."

We read of a large—representative—number of redeemed souls who stood "with the Lamb on Mount Zion," and were the "first fruits unto God." They had gained that redemption through great tribulation, and had washed their robes and made them white. It would appear by this rendering of scripture that they did not rely upon Jesus, or any other person, to wash their robes and do the work for them; but they worked out their own salvation by following him in the work of self-denial, and bearing the same cross that he bore. Does not the same power exist now that did then? and the same God who ruled the heavens and communed with mortals and sent mediators—messengers—to aid them in the work of redemption, and enable them to become his sons and daughters then, live to-day?

I believe there is a "Mount Zion" at the present time; and that the dual-Christ—male and female—the Lamb and Bride with a large company of virgins followers and co-workers; and that they proclaim as with one voice, "Now has come salvation and strength, the kingdom of our God and the power of his Christ;" the accuser of saints, in all past ages, is now cast out—slain." Having been fully awakened to the truth of St. Paul's declaration, that "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and is contrary to it," and that Christ's followers must walk in the spirit, and crucify the flesh with all its concomitants, this virgin band, by confession, have cast off the old deeds that were wrought in darkness; their deeds have gone beforehand to judgment, and they stand acquitted; their consciences are at peace with God and all mankind. This is a treasure that no earthly power can give nor take from its possessor.

I rejoice in spirit that I am called to this beautiful inheritance—that I have received the fulfillment of the promise of an hundred-fold of fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, and houses and lands, now in this world, and have felt the power of an endless life in my soul, with an assurance that it will continue and increase, while the ages roll, if I remain faithful. If some who are called into this work, and run well for a season, should turn again into sinful paths—to the weak and beggarly elements of a worldly life,—and thus their light be turned into great darkness, it need not discourage any faithful soul; but rather be a cause of rejoicing, that God sends his angels—messengers—to "gather out of his kingdom all that offend."

The plan of salvation was laid in great wisdom; but it is so plain, just and true, that the wayfarer of small capacity, if honest, may understand it. "Cease to do evil, and learn to do well"—do right. There is no promise given that any one would be saved from sin, and its consequent miseries while continuing in sin. Neither sin nor sinners belong in Christ's kingdom.

FIRE.

At the upper Family, Canaan, ashes emptied into the Leach Tub, close to the Wash House, kindled a fire two days afterward. It was discovered at 9 o'clock at night, otherwise not a building would have been left on the premises.

LABOR.

CHRIST has come to seek and save that which was lost. The Gospel is a work of redemption for poor human souls, willing to give up every thing to obtain its blessings. Persons coming here, seeking salvation, should be informed what they are expected to do.

They should learn that we, as a people, are not idle, and that this is not an idle place; that to gain salvation, we have to work for it, both in temporal and spiritual things; not by acting according to the dictates of our own wills, working at this or that thing as long, or as short as we choose, thereby creating confusion generally; but by being obedient, not merely to our Elders, but also to those who have any business in charge, and by showing faithfulness in whatever we may be called to do. Thus, we not only find satisfaction, but also gain knowledge of what there is within us, which is just what we need. The evil elements in our hearts are touched and stirred up, and we can see where the battle-field is, and what we have to contend against.

By confessing our past sins and putting them away, determined not to yield to the tempter any more, we have one point gained. This enables us, in a degree, to break the chains that bind us to earth, and by watching the workings of the enemy within us, and resisting him, we gradually rise out of the lower sphere into the higher—from the natural into the spiritual life.

EXTRAORDINARY CURE.

AUSTRALIAN LETTER.

—O—

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Like one snatched from the dead, I resume social and business relations with my brethren of humanity. You are aware that I have for upwards of two years been suffering from a chronic disease of the stomach, from which neither Spirits—Media nor Medical men seemed capable of relieving me. This disease culminated about a month ago, in one mass of ulceration from the tip of my tongue to the bottom of my stomach—and like Job of old I preferred death and the grave to the miserable existence I then had. My medical adviser told me my case was utterly hopeless—and the spirits attending me told me they were now waiting to take me home.

Three days and nights I was in constant expectation of departing, my wife constantly remained with me; my family, and two or three select friends watched by me in turns. Upwards of a dozen spirits were in almost constant attendance, soothing and comforting me, assuring me that they would not leave me in my distress and that they were there for the express purpose of mitigating my sufferings to the whole extent of their power, and rendering my passage to the Father's presence as easy as possible. These spirits including my father, mother, paternal and maternal grandfathers and mothers, a brother and sister, father-in-law, and five or six more of my near relatives in the spirit home, manifested day and night, not only to me, but to every person in the house. Copious instructions were given in spirit writing and by other means to every one what to do. When they should go to bed, when and whom to watch with me, whom to admit into the house, whom to invite, and whom to meet at the door without admitting them further. In fact the whole household arrangements were for three days and nights under spirit control. On the third and last night of my severe illness, my spirit friends summoned all my earth friends to bid me good-bye, and allowed only one besides my wife and children to see me die. My hands and face changed color, my feet grew numb—when all at once I was seized hold of by some extraordinary power, and shaken violently in bed, so violently that the bed shook also. I was shaken at the rate of more than two hundred vibrations per minute from side to side, for three or four minutes, the length of vibration across my bowels being about three inches. Somewhat alarmed, I asked the Spirits if this was death, and if it would be a painful struggle for me. The Spirits attending me told me they did not know what this was at all. In all previous death-bed scenes they had never seen anything like it. They desired me to trust in God with perfect confidence; I was undoubtedly under the control of a power superior to them at the time, with which it was impossible for them to interfere; but God assuredly was with me, and I might with great certainty repose perfect confidence in him. Meanwhile they would not leave me till they saw what was determined respecting me, telling me at the same time that though they certainly expected to take me with them that night, yet no Spirit save only those in the immediate presence of the Father, to whom He communicated the intelligence, could absolutely foretell when death would happen to any one, their power of judging was superior to that of mortals, only in proportion to their greater experience and progression, nothing more.

The result of this fearful shaking was, that an obstruction which all treatment had failed to disturb was removed, and since that time I have gradually but surely mended in health. The Spirit attendants have all left me but one, as their presence is required elsewhere; but they assure me of being constantly watched by one attendant at least, who can instantly summon others when I really need their services. John Finlay.

CHITTENDEN, VT., Oct. 30, 1875.

DEAR FATHER EVANS—I saw, in your monthly, a letter from Dr. Miller, stating: "They say the Eddy Brothers are jealous of their Sister, Mrs. Hunter."

Please allow me to say, through your beautiful little paper, if there be jealousy, Horatio G. Eddy has no part in it.

I have witnessed my sister's seances two evenings only; I never saw such wonderful manifestations; I will not attempt to describe them.

I was disappointed; old Mrs. Eaton, a spirit in William's seances, said Mrs. Hunter was a fraud. There was no fraud the two evenings I was there. I was surprised and glad to know she had so wonderful a gift; I wish there was a good materializing medium in every house, and spirits seen in all places.

Good Angels, bless every medium in the land; do all you can to convince the doubting, that they have an immortal spirit. Their prison bars will be broken; churches rot and decay; lawyers defraud no more for money; ministers and all will have to do right, for the spirits of the dear ones can tell their own story.

Good spirits, do your noble work; come in every house; I could beg, in every street, to have your work go on; I am humble, and ask no praise for what the spirits do through me; but bless the spirits for doing their work.

Such, friend Evans, are my feelings.

Publish, if it seem you good.

Horatio G. Eddy.

WORK.

—O—

"If all the year were playing holidays,
To sport would be as tedious as to work;
But when they seldom come, they wish'd for
come,

And nothing pleaseth but rare accidents."

ONE of the greatest means of assistance to those struggling for redemption from the existing evils of society, is the privilege of daily labor. Our ideas and aspirations are usually far in advance of what we are, in our worldly condition, capable of. Our ideal of a life of purity is, practically, a life of many burdens; it is only through the "fiery furnace" of trial that we are qualified for that life that has ever been our ideal of what the earth life should be. During these days of regeneration a busy hand is a safety-valve, as it were, to an overcharged brain and heart. Time spent in brooding over our dark thoughts, and in listening to the enticing voices of the sirens of the world, is simply time spent in creating troubles with which we may have to battle months and years before conquering. Humble yourselves with labor—"therefore he brought down their hearts with labor." Work hard, until the physical man is stilled and tired; and then, in tranquillity and rest, receive the ministrations of the spirit. Our days of rest are enhanced by their becoming a necessity; the hours devoted to general intellectual enjoyments are made pleasurable by their being the exception and not the rule; "when they seldom come, they wish'd for come." David, in promising reward to the righteous, says: "Thou shalt eat the labor of thine hands; happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee." Eat not "the bread of idleness," either in spiritual or temporal things, for it is while in this open condition of inactivity that our minds are filled with doubts and wonderings; it is then that evil influences fill our souls, simply because of the dearth of those good influences which are attendant upon constant conscience-satisfying labor.

SHAKERESS.

A. DOOLITTLE, EDITRESS.

DEFINED THOUGHT.

THOUGHTS are the parents of actions. Action, without profound consideration, is often disastrous in results. Speculative ideas and theories, however good they may be, unsupported by actual works, are like spectral objects, floating in the air, ever eluding the grasp—mere phantasy resembling the fairy-land, and at best, a dream life. Good works are the product of ripened thought—the fruit of true desires.

If we reason, as God has given us the power to do, our deductions are, that Sin is the cause of all the misery and suffering in the human family.

Disease of every kind, pertaining to body or mind, whether inherited, or created through our own volition, is a distinctive mark of violated law! Instead of a beautiful earthly home, where Truth and Justice bear rule, we are now forced to open our vision upon a pandemonium—a stronghold of unclean birds—ravenous vultures—the legitimate progeny of Sin in its varied forms and degrees, and we see through a murky atmosphere, dark specters, casting gloomy shadows over the pathway of life.

If we enter into the palaces of kings, the domiciles of the venerated priesthood, the cottages of the lowly, or the huts of savages, we find everywhere the same law existing. The foul breath of sin produces physical disease, moral deformity, and spiritual death. "Wasting and destruction are in the land." Thorns and briars spring up to pierce the feet of those who travel the highway of life, metaphorically speaking, and in the soil from which we derive physical sustenance, they choke the good seed, while the mildew, the locust and the caterpillar, blight and destroy, often causing a stunted harvest of food, inadequate to the needful demands of life. How shall this be remedied?

The dignitaries, in the popular churches, say, Ignorance is the root of degenerate plants, and point to savage tribes as proof. Again, they direct attention to, and bemoan what they call heathenism in pagan lands, where Christ has not been preached. The apostle Paul, speaking of the worshippers of idols of gold, silver and precious stones, said: "The times of this ignorance God winked at." By this we may judge of the difference between the sin of ignorance and willful transgression. Jesus said: "This is the condemnation, that light has come into the world."

Will a salaried priesthood, who eat the fat of the land through the labors of others, ever be found ready and willing to "cry aloud, and spare not the transgressions of the people?" and to tell them that "there is no peace for the wicked, and that every one will be rewarded according to their works?" Let the professed spiritual leaders of the people come forth in the spirit of the Divine Teacher, and, firstly, by example, then by precept, admonish and instruct their flocks, that God will not accept any thing short of honesty, justice and equity; that all who worship Him to His acceptance must do it in the spirit of sincerity and in the truth; that all the passions of body and mind, and the individual will must be brought into subjection to the law of right—the law of Christ. Let him or her who has been accustomed to steal, do so no more. Let the incontinent man or woman become chaste in habitude and thought, and the lying tongue and deceitful lips be made to speak truth in lieu of falsehood, and the speculator, who lives upon unjust gains, put his own hands to work, and prove that honest, faithful labor is a blessing—God's boon to humanity—a moral elevator.

As a rule, they who live in idleness upon the labors of others are voluptuous and sensual, spending their time in riotous living, wasting their energies upon perverted appetites, and watching an opportunity to despoil the unwary, and add fuel to the smoldering embers which lurk in the bosoms of the physically and morally degenerate beings, whose spirits, when freed from the shattered clay tenement, will appear like smutty chimney-sweeps. Will not waters as effective as those of Damascus and Jordan be requisite to cleanse and fit them for the society of the good and pure?

The good Master said: "Go work in my vineyard." We may weep over the fallen, and strive to alleviate by kind words; we may pity the poor, in word, and bestow charity from our abundant stores, but there are stronger claims, sterner duties resting upon those who occupy the position of advance guards of the public weal. If the sin and disease of the human heart have not gained full dominion, and there is hope yet for humanity, by emancipation from the servitude of sin and wrong-doing, is it not high time for the loquacious rhetoric of pulpit orators, to give place to sound doctrine? Educate the masses to know that they will have to atone for their own sins, by repenting and forsaking. Teach them that the virtue which will adorn the chambers of the heart and make it a fit receptacle for angel visitants, is true wealth. Turn the tide of thought, that gold and silver is the wealth that bears upon its breast the strongest power to sway the destinies of nations or individuals.

The clergy, who pass through colleges and seminaries of learning, to fit them for the work of the ministry, instead of seeking until they find the baptism of the Holy Spirit—the unction of Divine Power—until the words which they speak really convey spirit and life to the hearers, are fast losing their hold upon the confidence of the people, and will be displaced by the rising spiritual prophets of the present age, who are coming up, all over the land, outside of the churches.

True inspirational power will carry an unmistakable force with it, and be its own witness. The lo here's and lo there's will avail little in the sequel. By their fruits—not words—will all spiritual media be known. There will not be much doubt in the minds of truth-seekers and truth-doers, where the Christ of God is found. Those who are truly inspired—sent of God—will not turn aside from their purpose with fear, lest the leaf shall fade, the fig tree refuse to yield her fruit, and there be no grapes on the vine, knowing, full well, that the same hand that feeds the raven will supply the needs of those who trustingly work, watch and pray. God is the just rewarder of those who diligently seek and serve Him.

"IF I BE LIFTED UP I WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME."—JESUS.

To our spiritual understanding, there are three clear, inferential statements in this remarkable and peculiar expression:

Firstly, That there was a time when Jesus was not lifted up, or the thoroughly redeemed man he afterward became, else why the "If I be lifted up?"

Secondly, That by "lifting up" he meant something immeasurably more significant than the manner by which his spirit was to be released from the clay it was sojourning in.

Thirdly, The immense magnetic power derived from a life lifted up above the ordinary conditions of materiality, and which induced him to believe, with the eye of faith, that he would eventually "draw all men unto him."

That he was "tempted on all points like as we are" we believe, though the high Jewish discipline he had been subjected to had kept him, like Paul, "blameless concerning the law," still we can scarcely find any who have been more severely and continuously tempted.

The apostle says a man "is tempted when he is drawn aside by his own lust and enticed." But as Jesus came off conqueror, he knows how to feel for, and "succor those who are tempted, and with the temptation make a way for their escape."

The only Archimedian lever which can move the world of mankind, spiritually, and lift them up to the heights where they too may win souls to right doing, is the cross of self-denial Jesus practiced and taught, and which yields by destroying self-love, disinterested love to God and man.

E. H. Webster, Harvard, Mass.

LOVE TOKEN.

—0—

DEAR ELDERESS ANTOINETTE:

I would proffer love to you, and grateful acknowledgments for the benefit that I have derived from the perusal of the S. and S. It has been filled with mental instruction and soul-food, which to me have been like sweet manna. I am mindful that it has caused many hours of weariness and toil on your part to make it so good and acceptable.

My thanks are due to all who aid the cause

By pen, or works, and keeping laws,

In building up the good and true

In this our Zion home below.

I would encourage those who are young to ever bear in mind while they are forming habits of life, that self-denial in the mind is the first requisite for the formation of a true and substantial character; always let pleasure-seeking be subservient to duty and principle. Curb vain thoughts, and restrain sinful desires, then it will be easy to bridle the tongue and sow seeds of peace and love, instead of discord and strife.

How beautiful it is to see those who are full of youthful vigor and activity, turning the strength of their minds to self-culture—training themselves to become useful—to honor God, and to bless the race by their existence. To do this, the voice of conscience must be regarded in small things which will lead to the observance of counsels, rules and regulations which are constructed for the well-being and protection of society at large, and are way-marks in our consecrated Zion home. In this way, the evils of the human heart are subdued—character is made brilliant and beautiful, and the soul is happy and filled with peace and joy. All such souls are an ornament and strength in Zion, and a blessing to humanity; their influence is healthful and saving wherever they are.

Eliza R. Avery, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

SOCIAL GATHERING.

—0—

CECELIA:

I know that you all would be pleased to hear
A little acoustic, quaint and clear,
That Martha whispered into my ear,
About this day of reaping.
Now, Martha, will you be so kind as to tell
The words that Our Social Gathering spell?
They sound to me like a silver bell,
Their music my mind is keeping.

MARTHA:

Out of the growth of a hundred years,
Union with ripened fruit appears;
Righteousness, sown in toil and tears
Spreads, like the oak, its leaves,
Over the hills and plains of earth.
Change to the seeds of good gave birth
Increasing harvests of priceless worth;
Angels garnered the sheaves.
Light and knowledge, through human law,
Gave, as the prophets of old foresaw,
A safe retreat from oppression's war,
That the ranks of the martyrs swelled.
Here, in a land of liberty,
Earth has proclaimed her children free;
Rights that they cherished sacredly,
In lawful chains are held.
Now we behold, while peace bears sway,
Glad omens of millennial day.

MARGARET:

We bring to our annual gatherings
The treasures of life and love,
And gifts of our spirits mingle
With those of the Heavenly Dove.
They're a garner for thought, a garner for truth,
Kept sacred by holy resolves,
Made pure by the faith that unites us as one,
The union that never dissolves.
Incentives to action, to labor and prayer,
We gather from year unto year,
While a knowledge of life, its duties and care,
Disrobes the dim future of fear.
They are like a morning of beauty and light,
A morning that never departs,
But bears on its wings the promise of life,
And the rest that true conquest imparts.
And ever anon we hear the glad sound
Of blessing from kindred afar,
Who long for a share of the pleasure we reap,
Which pleasure no evils will mar.
With joy in our hearts, we await them each year;
United together we say,
O! let them continue, they are unto us
A light to illumine our way.

ANN:

Among the peace gifts of my life,
Is one that glitters bright;
Its glory lingers in my heart
Like everlasting light.
The thought—I mingle on this spot
With those I love most dear—
Arises like the morning sun
Unto my vision clear.

Oh may the gift that here is won,
Upon me rest in peace,
And may a deeper sacrifice
Bring to me truth's increase,
And cherished in life's memory
Shall be this hour of love,
When gifts of holy pleasure come
From Zion pure above.

ELVAH:

When the shadows of evening are gathering 'round,
And the breath of the rose is hidden or blown;
When hushed is the sound of labor and care,
And quietude seals the day that is flown,
Then cometh the hour that gladly I meet,
The hour for angels to reign in our home,

Who breathe o'er the souls my heart fondly loves,
And whisper the joy of the future to come.
'Tis then I can view the fair Zion of God,
Increasing in glory, in honor and light;
'Tis then I'm inspired to toll to the day
When truth will be monarch and right will be might.

CECELIA:

I thought from Margaret's speaking,
A little while ago,
There was at least one place on earth
Where Sharon's rose could grow;
Where hearts, by consecration,
Could draw the angels near;
And, since we heard that blessed song,
I know that place is here.

MARGARET:

There is no spot on earth so dear
As this on which we stand,
Made hallowed by the meeting here
Of friends from spirit land.
Could their material forms be seen,
What joy it would create.
Why not? 'tis just a step between
This and the future state,
A step that every one must take,
For we must leave each earthly scene;
Then, let our faith unbar the gate,
And love push back the screen.

CHARLOTTE:

The great beyond! 'Tis near our life,
I long to see and hear
Fulfillment of the promises
By prophet and by seer.
'Tis not for slight of spirit forms,
This yearning is within,
But the uplifting of the race
From sickness and from sin.
I know that poverty will fall
Beneath this mighty flow,
And earth no longer reel and toss
With her strong weight of woe.
For yon bright souls can better find
And melt the hearts of ire,
Than dwellers here below, who ne'er
Have doffed the earth's attire.
When mortals know they're really seen
By beings up above,
The wrongs of life will yet be changed
And hearts will grow in love.
And, though from me that law is hid
That governs this great power,
I know 'tis true! and so I wait
The spirit's day and hour.

ELVAH:

Who knows but what this world will blended be
With that unseen above? And hence eternity
Will be as dwelling here upon the earth,
From birth to death, and thence again to birth.
For if, by passing on from sphere to sphere,
We understand we die, yet live again,
Our life with all creation will combine
To show that vital forces will remain.
How grand and e'en sublime we view to-day,
With eyes of full belief, the spirit forms
That come from that dim, vague and wondrous land,
In human shape that life-blood freely warms!

MELISSA:

There's nothing new, the sage hath said,
And growth with this is rife;
The theme that fills the mind to-day,
And throbs the pulse of life,
Was regnant when the Nazarene
Received the spirit birth,
While the old corridors of life
Portrayed its ancient worth.
From Genesis to Revelation,
From Revelation on through time,
We see its phases, while its truth
With our best thoughts can chime.

CECELIA:

As Catharine claims a long descent
From those who dwell in Israel's tent,
It was hut right to have her sent
To search the book of Moses.
The spirit power that there is found
Is like the giant race it crowned:
It stands, the ages to confound,
By all that it discloses.
So, Catharine, tell us what you saw,
And what the inference you draw,
How far you probed the potent law
That mystery incloses.

CATHARINE:

Adown the vista of the past
We see through time's dim mists,
That with the human race this soul
Of science co-exists.
The records of antiquity
Are all agleam with stories
Of how the spirit power wrought out
Its wonders and its glories.
The tutelary deity
That anciently o'er-ruled;
That in the laws of mundane life
The tribes of Israel schooled,
With Moses many times communed,
As clad in man's attire;
And, sometimes, brilliantly appeared
Within a bush of fire.
"I Am," he simply called his name,
When proffering the mission
Through which his chosen ones could find
Deliverance and remission.
When unto Moses he gave power
King Pharaoh's heart to move,
In visitations that he sent
To punish and reprove,
The magic rod, that Moses used,
His wonders to perform,
When struck upon the ground, received
A serpent's life and form.
The plagues of flies and frogs were sent,
The waters turned to blood,
And locusts swarmed upon the earth,
Consuming all the food.
O'er Egypt sable veils were drawn—
Three days were as the night—
While Israel's children all abode

In dwellings filled with light.
But Pharaoh's heart was still too hard
To let the captives go,
Until the Lord, by heavier hand,
His judgment strong would show.
But when he found in every house
A first-born struck with death,
That e'en his son upon the throne
No more had life and breath,
He rose in midnight's darksome hour,
His servants to command,
That Moses with all Israel
Might quickly flee the land.
All through their dreary exodus,
To guide their feet aright,
A pillar moved as cloud by day,
That brightly glowed at night.
They marched through trackless wilderness
Until they heard the roar
Of waves, that from the Red Sea rolled
To wash its pobbly shore.
And, then, they heard the marshal tread
Of Pharaoh's host draw near;
But Moses, filled with faith and hope,
Delivered them from fear.
The guiding angel, that was clothed
In cloud and radiance bright,
Cast darkness on the enemy,
While giving Israel light;
Then Moses stood, with outstretched arm,
Commanding the great sea
To rise in walls on right and left
And clean divided be Till every child in Israel
Had passed upon dry ground;
But, when its might returned again,
The enemy were drowned.

MARTHA:

By these great works the people knew
Their Lord before them moved,
His power to save in danger's hour
Unto their hearts was proved.
But, when encamped upon the land
To which they had been led,
Their hunger prompted murmurings
For Egypt's meat and bread.
The Lord, who always heard their cries,
Replied with blessings free,
Appearing to them in a cloud
Whose glory all could see.
With evening shade there fell soft dew,
Like hoar-frost on the ground,
And in the morning everywhere
Fresh manna could be found.
'Twas gathered from the atmosphere—
We'll say, "materialized"—
And thus, for forty years, their bread
Was daily improvised.

ANN:

When journeying o'er the desert waste
They found no water-brooks,
And bitter murmurings Moses felt
Expressed in words and looks.
He bade them wait until the Lord
Could satisfy their thirst,
Then with his rod smote Horeb's rock
Till water from it burst.
A living spring came bubbling out,
A sparkling, flowing tide;
Its source was in the viewless power
Which all their needs supplied.

CATHARINE:

From types and shadows in the past
Comparison we draw
To Zion fair, whose growth shall prove Fulfillment of the law.
The little ark, before us placed,
Brings to our vision clear
The ark that was the cabinet
Through which the Lord drew near.
The principles of righteousness,
And testimony pure,
Were in the ark of covenant
Held sacred and secure.
On these, from precious metal wrought,
Was placed the Mercy Seat,
Whereon the Lord could speak His will,
And with His chosen meet.
The Cherubs, 'neath Shekinah's light,
In beauty there express
The dual life of Deity,
The Altar of redress.
Another type of ancient time
In Zion is redeemed,
The breast-plate by the high-priest worn,
Through which the Lord convened.
Its form was of a perfect square;
This meant equality,
That all the tribes of Israel
Might perfect justice see:
Twelve precious stones composed this plate,
Through these, in time of counsel,
God's answer was proclaimed.
Shekinah's light the letters marked
That spelt each needed word,
When Prophet, Priest or Ruler,
In duty sought the Lord.
Ideals of the past give place
To grand reality,
The substance of those shadows dim,
In brightness now we see.
We feel and know, by inner sense,
Their meaning deep and blest;
For with the Lord's Anointed Ones
The Ark and treasures rest.
And Mercy Seat, O sacred gift!
Its worth is more than gold.
More purely than could Cherubim
Their wings or hearts enfold
The breast-plates by their spirits worn
Of judgment from above,
Metes to our souls God's justice true,
Clothed in parental love.
In the Shekinah's light they dwell,

And by it they can read—
Not lettered symbols of old—
But life with all its need.

MARGARET:

This growth of human spirit power
In beauty was displayed,
When on the Altar of the Lord
Their rods twelve princes held;
When Aaron's chosen by the will
Of overruling powers,
Was caused to yield the bud and fruit
Of fragrant almond flowers.
Thus far these time-famed miracles,
To which we have referred,
Through Moses' gift of mediumship
Have principally occurred;
But, when his days of leadership
Were drawing to a close,
The mantle rested on the one
Whom God in wisdom chose.
And, thus, when Joshua led them forth
To find the promised land,
Like the Red Sea, were Jordan's waves,
Divided, caused to stand.

MELISSA:

Still further on, we read of those
Who could materialize;
Who, having left the earth, again
Could wear the mortal guise.
With Samuel this was the case;
He through the witch of Endor came,
Her powers secretly were sought,
With safety promised in God's name.
He showed himself unto King Saul,
And openly conversed,
While Saul, who asked his counsel wise
His grievances rehearsed.

ELVAH:

And have not all the story read
Of Elijah by the ravens fed,
And how the widow's oil increased
When its supply had almost ceased,
And meal that only once could feed
Was multiplied as growth of seed?
And when Elijah went his way
Within the wilderness to stay,
Requesting of the Lord to die
And with his fathers dwell on high,
He laid him 'neath a tree and slept,
While angel guards their vigils kept.
Their soft touch caused him to awake,
And, lo! beside him was a cake,
And water pure within a cruise,
Which they had brought there for his use.

CHARLOTTE:

Those were pleasant incidents,
And, though they seem hut small,
To me they're quite as wonderful
As Hount with her shawl;
And little yet, at Chittenden,
Has been materialized,
But that the past, in prototype,
Has fully realized.
The spirit friends and chariots, seen
By all the Eddy brothers,
Soon before they had to part
With one of their grandmothers,
Did not require higher law
Or stronger spirit forces,
Than those which caught Elijah up
With chariot's fiery horses.

MARGARET:

A strange event, of which we read,
To us is now made clearer,
By one who lived five hundred years
Before the Christian era.
She who appears as mountain witch,
Whose home was in the East,
Was present when Belshazzar, king,
Held his ungodly feast.
And through her influence there came
The writing on the wall,
Predicting that a judgment hand
So soon on him would fall.
To mountain clefts she had to flee
From persecution's storm;
But now she often comes to earth,
Her mission to perform.

ANN:

With spiritual phenomena
The olden times were rife,
In several cases written then
The dead were raised to life.
Daniel, in the lion's den,
All night in safety dwelt;
The Hebrew sons through fire walked,
Its flames by them unfelt.
The miracles that Jesus wrought
We have not specified;
But that they were realities,
I think we coincide.
We know that all of them occurred
By laws yet unrevealed;
Within the future's treasury,
From us they are concealed.

CHARLOTTE:

We've learned that death is not the end of man;
There is an after-life we all must know;
A spirit-world, where countless souls abound
Who've learned the bearings of a life below.
These bible records of the spirit power
Confirm the truth within—we live and breathe
With friends departed, who our pathway cheer,
And joy amid our sorrows gladly breathe.
From fire and storm and fierce destructive powers
A Saviour in a dream or warning oft they give;
This dawning law will yet become our guide.
The shadow with the substance now doth live;
We know that to the substance we are dim or dark,
But grasp the shadow with an anxious fear;
Our purblind vision can but dimly mark
What in the spirit life is full and clear.

CHANGE.

While earthly charms sur-round us, For spirit is the power, Mayhap to search the future, And all is bright and fair, And each material thing Is sub-ject to the changes, Untraversed fields to roam, Or led by angel guardiana, In this ter-res-trial sphere, That hidden forces bring, Revisit our earth home,

We know these are but shadows, So, are our mortal dwellings, To mingle with our kindred, That, in the grand be-yond, The substance without shadow Will to the soul re-spound. By spirit here controlled, 'Till silently we leave them For mysteries yet un-told, Appear be-fore their eyes, As, when we with them journeyed In earth's material guise.

RESPECTFUL MANNERS.

To young persons, and to some, not so very young, a correspondent offers the following:

In speaking to many, or to few, let your words be chaste, respectful, and distinctly articulated. Common justice requires this—self-respect requires it.

As to coming in, salutation, being seated, rising and taking leave, we deem no instructions needful. Well-disposed persons will, intuitively, be well behaved. With such as are so deficient in self-respect as not to be well disposed, we have, at present, no vocation.

To correspondents—to contributors—to all, who write, expecting others to read, we respectfully suggest, that you wait till you are quite sure you have an idea—an idea that will interest some body besides your own dear self.

When sure you have an idea, put that idea in the fewest possible words. Put the words together mechanically, in pursuance of the laws of language. Let your sentences be short. Don't send your readers away back to hunt for your nominative case, or antecedent.

In this fast age, such is the deluge of would be reading matter, that writers, if they would have readers, must write, not wholly for their own edification—ED.

PARSEES—"As a race, the Parsees are intelligent, active and energetic; with business capacities far above the average, they are usually successful in amassing wealth, while they are extremely benevolent in dispensing their gains for both public and private charities. For private benefaction they have, however, but little call among themselves, since a Parsee pauper would be an unheard-of anomaly. They burn upon their sacred altars fire which they brought from Persia, and which has never been extinguished since it was kindled by Zoroaster from the sun 4000 years ago. They think it can never go out till it has consumed all evil from the earth and the good has become universally triumphant. * * * Memory fails to recall the case of a single fire worshipper who was not strictly upright in his dealings. * * * Commencing with the worship of the sun and of fire as his emblem, the Parsee grew into a sort of reverence for the elements of air, earth and water. The air must not be contaminated by foul odors, and of necessity no filth could be tolerated anywhere, in houses, street or suburb, and to this reverence for the purity of the atmosphere may be traced the absolute cleanliness for which fire worshippers are everywhere noted."—Investigator.

SUNSHINE IN HOUSES.

THE time very likely will come when sunshine or sunlight will be so utilized as to be the entire remedy used for very many diseases. That it is a wonderful fertilizer none can doubt who know any thing about it. But how many houses are constructed with a view to getting all the sunshine possible, especially when so much is needed in winter and spring? The living or sitting room, at these seasons of the year at least, should have full Southern exposure, with large windows to let in the sunshine. All sleeping rooms, closets, wardrobes and passage ways should receive the cleansing, vivifying influence of the sun. Sickly persons should court the sunshine as much as possible—sit in it, lie in it, luxuriate in it. It doesn't cost any thing, only appreciation. A room warmed neither by sun nor by fire is unhealthy, and not fit for human habitation. It is a poor theory that sends men, women and children off into a cold room to sleep on healthy principles, when warmth has been excluded for a day or week, or perhaps months. The change in the temperature of a room having both fire and sunshine, after the sun goes down, is exceedingly marked. A perceptible chill is felt.

SPIRIT COMMUNICATION.

To F. W. EVANS:

A full basket, when presented, gives pleasure to the one presenting it, and to the receiver more than he can express,—hence all the baskets used in such a manner, would tend to harmonize a multitude, much larger than are assembled around, or in a so-called sacred edifice, where on a Sabbath Day, the so-called christian world assemble to offer prayers and praises, to a God they know but little of, straining their every nerve to become popular in their utterances.

Making long harangues of little import, more than to evoke the ridicule of men, who prefer a respectful silence to the blarney of a proud and ostentatious priest, who seeks the applause of men without a single aspiration to become approved of God and the "Invisibles."

James Lawrence, Cleveland, Ohio. March 3, 1873.

THE opinion is quite general that Thomas Paine was an atheist, but this extract from his last will seems to leave no room for doubt that, in spite of his skepticism on other points, he was a believer in God: "Reposing confidence in my Creator, God, and in no other Being, for I know of no other, nor believe in any other, I, Thomas Paine, of the city of New York, author of the work entitled 'Common Sense,' written in Philadelphia, in January, 1776, which awakened America to a Declaration of Independence on the 4th of July," etc., etc.

Communications in future, to be addressed, "THE SHAKER," Shakers, Albany Co., N. Y.

"There is nothing covered which shall not be revealed" Is now being fulfilled.

The almost incredible revealments of "Satan in Society" are fully sustained by Women and Men, who claim to speak from sorrowful experience, and observations—fully establishing the scandalous fact, that worst prostitution—most outrageous abuse of reproductive powers—of humanity—is perpetrated under sanction of law—cloaked under the sacred (?) ordinance of Matrimony.

AS CHRISTIANITY is gradually compelled to give up civil government, so it will gradually be compelled to give up associations with metaphysics, with long creeds, and with apostolic succession, and chorals and candles, and betake itself into the soul, and find its empire to be bounded by faith in Christ, and an upright life. In that day, and may it hasten its coming, all the hearts that love Christ and do the will of God will be one.

David Swing.

THE expenses of States, counties, cities and towns in the Northern States, not represented by funded debts, have been estimated at $500,000,000. The increase of State debts on the war account was $123,000,000. The increase of city, town and county debts is estimated at $200,000,000. Total war expenses of the loyal States and the National Government, $6,165,237,000.

The estimated direct expenditures of the Confederate States on account of the war were $2,000,000,000. Aggregate expenses of the war to the country, North and South, $8,165,237,000. The total receipts of all sources during the second year of the war were less than $42,000,000. The expenditures were $60,000,000 per month—at the rate of $700,000,000 a year.

QUESTIONS.

As a people, why do we shave—cut off our beards? Why do the Chinese shave their heads, as they do their faces? Why do Chinese females cripple their feet, and some females their waists? Why does not Nature give up the struggle of centuries, and let Anglo-Saxon and Chinese men be born minus surplus hair, and their females be born with wasp-like waists, high heels, club-feet, and humps on their * * * s, and on the back of their heads? Does nature expect her children to become so same that they can leave off a bad habit, without dropping a good one to balance it—progression without retrogression?

TRIBUTE.

WEED, PARSONS & Co., PUBLISHING HOUSE, 39 & 41 Columbia St., Albany. Our Brother, Wm. Offord, was from England, where he was Master Printer and Methodist Minister. After going through the above named Printing House, he remarked, "I have never seen an office where the system was so perfect, the order so complete." I indorse that opinion. F. W. Evans.

EZRA T. LEGGETT.

Less than one pulse the universe is beating,
Less than one wave that breaks upon its shore,
A hundred circling rounds of earth, repeating,
The lights and shades that make life's varied store:
In days of long ago, an angel, sighing,
The lives of nations, and of men did write;
Their blood-stained fields, their martyred heroes dying,
Their broken altars, and their reign of night.

Not strange, the angel, from its golden pinions
Shook earth's dark dust, and soared to brighter spheres—

Not strange its tidings, from earth's dark dominions,
Less oft were heard in gladness, than in tears!
One hundred years! how few of hearts, unbroken,
That saw their light, and with their suns went down!

How few of hopes, then born, that left a token,
That life had conquered victory, or death a crown!

Again, the angel, with a brighter pluming,
Descends, as dew upon a thirsting world;
And barren deserts smile, as gardens blooming,
And Freedom's banner is to man unfurled.
Not to the east where Freedom's sons were lying,
Entombed by despots, in their country's grave;
But with its sister sun, the angel, flying,
The Promised Land seeks on the western wave.

There hills and dales, with life and love are blooming,
Where once was hidden nature's solitude;
Where night, as queen, with silence sat communing,
And bashful stars the murky darkness wooed:
There stranger nations coalesce, o'erflowing,
The land where once but nature's wild man trod;
There stranger tongues together blend, upgoing,
In thanks and praise, for liberty, to God!

Laud of the peerless mountain, lake and river —
Where all God's sons and daughters dare be free!
Where man hath covenant with God, forever,
That there shall be the home of Liberty!
There Freedom's hosts are heart to heart replying,
And echo gives the seas and mountains voice;
May Freedom's echoes, to the nations flying,
Rouse all earth's slumbering millions, to rejoice!

HENRY VINCENT ON ELDER EVANS.

—o—

HENRY VINCENT tells us this story:

"While Elder Frederic W. Evans was holding meetings in England in 1871, one of the Christian brethren became somewhat nervously excited over some of the theological views expressed by the good elder, and called out: 'What did Jesus Christ come into this world for? I demand of you what Jesus Christ came into this world for?' Elder Frederic paused in his discourse, and slightly leaning forward to get a better view of his assailant, spoke in his peculiar, clear voice: 'My friend, Jesus Christ came into this world to teach such men as you are how to govern their tempers.'"

EVERYDAY RELIGION.

—o—

ASCENATH C. STICKNEY.

THIS is the great necessity of the present age—the one thing needful to develop the Christian man or woman into that noble type of godliness, which characterized our Lord and Savior.

Christianity, in its perfection, is unlimited in character, and can never be confined to theories, creeds, nor cramped within the precincts of costly churches. The present state of society demands that now, more than ever, religion be available on every day of the week; that it enter every avenue of intelligence, and penetrate every by-way of civilized life every day.

The "Divine" needs it outside of the pulpit; the editor requires it in his sanctum, that, by its influence, his sentiments may go forth to the public, imbued with those elements of divine wisdom which tend to elevate as well as enlighten.

The merchant wants it to preside in his "counting-room" over his gains and losses. The teacher should seek it for a monitor in his school, where a pacific influence is so requisite for harmonizing those restless, miniature worlds called pupils. The doctor, the farmer, the parent, the citizen, all need this universal panacea, for the varied ills emanating from low unspiritual conditions.

The Shakers, as individuals and as a body, need it, and should have it, regardless of an inherent love of ease, of selfish gain, or any worldly considerations.

Finally, the whole world suffers for a religious life and education, broad enough to mantle every day of the week, as completely as the new-fallen snow mantles the hills and dales of our own country in winter.

As the new year advances, then, my friends, let us make individual efforts to secure this blessing to our various homes. "EVERY-DAY RELIGION" can be truthfully recommended as a "new thing under the sun," and worth more than many inventions for getting gain. It aids labor, increases soul-wealth, and promotes health of body and mind.

Therefore, let us resolve that religion, as a mere fact, shall no longer reside alone in church, nor find expression only in pulpit oratory; but that, henceforth, its theories be reduced to practice, and its most difficult problems illustrated by faithfulness in performing the varied duties of life, whether domestic, social or religious.

In conclusion, let us endeavor to buy and sell, speak and act, think and live, according to its dictates for one year; and we may anticipate a near millennium for this crime-laden, sin-stricken world, and a rapid advance toward that one condition so much desired, namely, happiness.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

—o—

WM. H. BUSSELL.

SCIENCE, in its completest sense, is the knowledge possessed by the Divine Being, which, of course, must be universal. As applied to human beings, it is that which leads to an acquaintance with Deity. What are the various classifications of so-called natural science? Geology, mineralogy, chemistry, botany, astronomy and zoology, but so many different fields in which God displays his own handiwork. One cannot intelligently and thoroughly study these, without attaining the conviction that they give evidence of an intelligence, power and skill immeasurably surpassing those of man; and whether, like Tyndall, he supposes the power and intelligence to reside within what he calls nature, or, with others, to be outside of it, yet to him there is a marvelous revelation of the supreme life.

Chemical analysis discloses to him the processes of creation to a certain extent; geology and mineralogy exhibit the creative power combining the elements, on a far grander scale; botany, displaying varied forms of beauty and splendor, evinces a yet higher degree of intelligence; astronomy, if it does not exhibit infinity itself in the countless worlds it brings to view, yet, like that, gives to the soul the most exalted sensations as it contemplates the scene before it; zoology brings him a step, and a long step farther toward the Divine existence. What multitudes of living beings does he behold in air, earth and ocean! How they confirm, by their ceaseless activity, the words of Jesus: "My Father works hitherto!"

It is not a presumptuous conjecture to say of the infinite life, that it never rests. It goes on forever in its work, producing grade after grade of varied existence, from that which requires the aid of the microscope to discover it, up through the creeping, walking, swimming, flying beings to man, savage, barbarous, intellectual and spiritual of the material spheres, and hence on to man immortal and angelic in the celestial worlds.

Science, in its most comprehensive sense, lays open, by degrees, all truths to the human mind; but these all, even the minutest, center in the Divine existence. They reveal him to us, not each to the same extent, but yet the revelation is genuine and divine. Why, then, the useless and absurd distinction of sacred and profane, applied to different things that lead us to the knowledge of God? Is any thing profane but that which is perverted from its original purpose by human beings? "God is in history" is language used by the celebrated historian, D'Aubigné, and justly so. God has led the whole human family all the way from the commencement of its existence, just as carefully, and by means of as many of his attending angels as he did the Israelites from Egypt to the promised land. All history, whether that commonly called profane, or that of the Bible—to which we are accustomed to apply the term sacred—shows the divinely-guiding hand. All that is worthy the name of science is sacred, and should be so regarded. That which treats of the Divine life, as manifested in the insect world, may be of a different grade, from that which discourses of suns and planets, or treats of the human mind in its intellectual, moral and spiritual aspects, yet really they are all one. When we attain to any degree of the knowledge of God, by means of what is commonly called natural science, or by intellectual and moral science, there is as really a revelation as though an angel from the highest heaven conveyed to us the information, or the infinite spirit had imparted it to us. The difference is only in the manner of obtaining it. The inspirations that diffuse through the human soul the life of divine love, may come to it through various mediums, yet are they all divine inspirations, communicating to it the knowledge of the divine life, and preparing it for its upward course to the realms of immortality.

REVIVALS.

HENRY C. BLINN.

"GET the revival down," seems to be a very appropriate form of advice, for those who are looking forward for a renewal of the pentecostal spirit, which is said to be so greatly needed in our favored land of civil and religious liberty. Get the revival down into the heart, that it may work for the purification of both body and soul.

A general impression pervades the community, that the coming winter is to peculiarly propitious in aiding the preparatory work, or, may be, in blessing us with the outpouring of a wonderful spiritual manifestation. Some of the teachers even in our own church have been anticipating, for some time past, the consummation of a revival that would equal, if not exceed, in the area of its operations, a larger section of country than did the revival of the war spirit during the "great rebellion."

Very few would presume to say that the renewal of promises and pledges, that the awakening into a deeper conviction for truthfulness and honesty, was not needed, and certainly these should be the fruits of a religious revival.

Get the revival down into the very springs of life, and help to baptize ourselves into an element that will not only wash externally, but will, as well, burn up all filthiness of the flesh and of the mind. The good old prophet has said that "the knowledge of the Lord will cover the land as the waters cover the sea." All hail to the dawn of this glorious day, when a revival of intelligence, of reason, of faith and good works shall be among us, and all in harmony with the government of Christ's kingdom, to which there is to be no end.

God makes the revival. Through His grace and the powerful operations of His spirit only, will any good be accomplished; but, with all this, God depends upon living, active and earnest agents to vivify his work among men.

To the people of God—spiritually dead or dying—a revival has a deep significance. Indeed, a revival of the spirit of religious interest should be hailed with more joy than a revival in trade, or a gala day of enjoyments. It is the life element of any order of people, professors or non-professors, and is essential, even, to the happiness of the individual. Our Shaker order dates its origin to the outpouring of the spirit of God; and for its establishment and its continuance in this country, we are indebted to those peculiar seasons which are termed religious revivals.

THE QUESTION AND THE ANSWER.

AMANDA M. KENISTONE.

WHEN strangers to our faith and life
Within our home appear,
In answer to their questionings,
The truth we would make clear.
They ask, "what unseen power attracts
And holds in its embrace,
So many young, aspiring minds,
In this secluded place?"

"Is it a cherished love of home—
The strength of friendship's chain?
The wreath that true affection weaves,
For which you here remain?
Or have the teachings of your friends
So closely twined your heart,
That conscience-smitten you would be,
Should you from them depart?"

"And do you never turn, to seek
A part in pleasure's strife?
Aspire you not to joys, and loves
Unknown to Shaker life?
As veiled in mystery you seem,
Quite happy, yet at rest;
Can you unfold the faith and power
Which mind and soul have blest?"

A reason of the faith and hope
By which we daily live,
We render cheerfully to those
Who listening ear will give.
Not bound by dogma—barred by creed—
Nor held by force of law;
The truth hath met our spirit's need,
From its pure fount we draw.

Surroundings of external caste,
However grand or high,
The longings of the inner soul,
Can never satisfy.
'Tis true, that love of home and friends,
Has power the heart to bind;
But what can meet the longings
Of active, reasoning minds?

'Tis truth in its simplicity,
Exemplified on earth,
And purity of life, unfolds
The germs of angel birth.
When these are quickened in the soul,
That "ever aching void,"
Which worldly pleasure never fills,
Finds blessings unalloyed.

Then faith, with reason is combined
Cause and effect to trace;
To learn the laws that God designed,
Should happily the race.
We see that earthly wealth amassed,
And learning's garnered sheaves,
Unless by wisdom's hand dispensed,
The soul still yearning, leaves.

True happiness is what we seek;
This virtue only yields;
We tread the shining way she marks,
And love her verdant fields.
Gay fashion's giddy throng we leave—
Who trifle life away;
For hours of bliss, an age of pain
Her forfeiture repay.

The Christian's part we nobly take,
And with the ransomed few,
We boldly vindicate, the truth
That forms all things anew—
The virgin principle uphold
That Jesus Christ revealed;
This basis of a perfect life,
His glorious mission sealed.

Though many sects that fill the land,
The Christian title claim,
And rear their gorgeous temples high,
In honor of the name;
Yet cant, and mockery within,
And loftiness of mien,
Fail to express the life, that crowned,
The lowly Nazarene.

From purity, true pleasure springs;
And peace, with love combined,
Have power to captivate the soul,
And earthly passions bind.
Where living faith and works agree,
And souls in good abound—
A home, from strife and discord free,
With truest friends we've found.

We hold our union to this band,
By deeds of righteousness;
And as our spirit powers expand,
In light and truth progress.
Though many fail to comprehend
The truth that makes us free,
We claim the boon of lasting peace,
And heavenly liberty.

SOCIOLOGY.

OLIVER C. HAMPTON.

MAN is evidently built on a sliding scale of relative perfections. His lower conditions, contrasted with those higher, of which he is capable, may be called evil for want of a better term. Experience and observation, as well as his past history, prove him capable of continuous and gradual but constant improvement, both when viewed in vast proportions as nations, peoples, or our entire world, in its movement in cycles of immense duration; also in regard to individual men, through the experience of a few fugitive years. Man's loves, in his lower rudimental conditions, are largely lusts, having for their object his individual selfish gratification. Yet the law of eternal progression which runs through the universe, gradually improves his conditions, making man less sinister and more generous and benevolent, pure and sincere, until he occupies a serene home among the archangels. At least this is inevitably inferred from the fertile span of existence furnished us for observation here on the earth. This law of eternal progression is God-given, for man cannot revoke it by any act or incantation, though he may oppose his motion skyward, and even delay his sublime apotheosis for many long years. The more he expands toward higher regions of perfection, the nearer he approaches his fellow man in love and sympathy, until so far developed as to be prepared for a community life. Indeed, along the whole, otherwise gloomy path of human experience, or as far back as we have any history, a few specimens of highly progressed humanity have appeared from age to age, to light the gloom of the dead centuries, and point to higher glories and sublimer possibilities. These have apprehended and practically developed, in a gradual manner, some of the more palpable facts, principles and truths of sociology.

But what an immense field of discovery yet remains to be explored in this direction. One curious coincidence connected with sociology is the fact that, so far as we know, every system of society or community which has had any practical success, has had to accept of celibacy as one of the most important, if not the most important, plank in its platform of primal principles. My subject might receive a curious and ingenious as well as true and valuable exegesis right here, highly favorable to the doctrine of celibacy and sexual purity, but, having caught but a glimpse of this bright and magnificent thought, I will leave it to the elaboration of those who have traced its logical sequences farther than I have. In reflecting upon man's nature in connection with the subject of sociology, I am of opinion that all men have, or ought to have, perfect, unrestrained freedom of will and choice as to what kind of life they shall live, so long as such freedom and exercise thereof does not interfere with the enjoyment of the same freedom of choice, rights and privileges of others. That all men are positively equal, under precisely the same circumstances, in rights and privileges, to all intents and purposes, until they infringe on tho of others; and even then, so soon as by warrantable restraint they can be induced always to respect the rights and immunities of their fellow men and women, they should come into possession of inherent rights. If the above postulates are true, the next inquiry would naturally be, what is the best mode of conducting the polity of a community? that is, the several details of different departments?

In the first place it appears self-evident to me, that just so much dictation and government should be resorted to as to secure the above-named immunities, etc., and positively no more. Any thing more than this does not deserve the name of legitimate and proper government, but of usurpation, which is itself an infringement upon the rights of others, and no more justifiable in an executive officer than in any other individual. Then if executive administrators of the government of a community can so economize the details of administration as never to transcend the limits here prescribed, it would appear, surely, to shut off all the friction among the elements of community that could come in through the avenue of its administration, and this will be very noticeable and important if it should happily ever be reached; for men, being under the same circumstances, equal in rights and privileges, though not in talents, powers and abilities, feel very keenly any infringement of this law of equality, and can never do otherwise. This unwillingness to be unrighteously and unjustly treated can never be overcome. It is an irresistible, eternal law, inexorable in its demands, the failure to satisfy which, must inevitably produce eternal antagonism.

Again, for the stability and smooth running of a community, it seems to me that some method must be pursued in its modus operandi by which every individual must stand, not indirectly, by implication, but directly by immediate affirmation, self-committed to its general interests and behests, and to all of its important movements and business. Without this desideratum, in vain shall we try to secure the hearty co-operation of the members in any enterprise small or great we may undertake. I have here written my views on the subject of sociology, as applicable to a successful community, and I am absolutely sure this subject needs ventilation. I would like to see THE SHAKER become a medium for the transmission of all kinds of useful knowledge adapted to its field, in all directions calculated to benefit humanity, mentally, physiologically, spiritually, scientifically, temporally and eternally.

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF SORROW.

—O—
SARAH ANN NEAL.

It is a fact, however strange, that in nearly all human life there is an inclination to look on the darker side of the human heart, brood over its trials, and to live in realms where despondency is germinated, permitted to grow and thrive, at the expense of the higher, brighter and most cultivated elements of our organization. But those whose interior beings have been lighted by the teachings of Christ's life have no occasion to despond, but are led to "look up through the clouds" and behold the "far brighter day," replete with beams of a heavenly light, that are never succeeded by darkening night. It has been wisely said, "every Christian sorrow is the harbinger of a new-born joy," and truly so; for sorrow, born of earthly endeavors for the right, is soul-elevating, and to be enjoyed, rather than endured, for its beneficent gains; but to obtain and enjoy these gains necessitates the practical exercise of Christ-principles—a sorrowing unto participation of joy in the heavenly. Christ suffered, sorrowed, and those who would be his disciples and follow him "whithersoever he goeth," will joyfully sorrow too. Liberty waved her gilded pinions over him who was "tempted in all points, yet without sin;" and this same signal victory and freedom from the erring nature of humanity await all, who, like our Christian pattern, earnestly, patiently, hopefully work. Such souls are the embodiment of a hope which creates holier aspirations, wakens nobler activity, and causes the soul to rise above the land of shadows into that world of radiant beauty, where all life is inspired by heavenly light and love. Despondency is very unlike Christian sorrow; is the fruit of spiritual indolence, whose tendency is to detract to greater gloom, and all for the want of development in spiritual refinement, through angel purity. While we would eradicate from society all despondency, we would cherish godly sorrow as the harbinger of soul-progress; for the truest feelings of the heart are borne upward—homeward—through the corridors of sorrow to the home of the eternal; and thence, with energies renewed, returning to the pilgrim, who is thereby better fitted for the sterner, fiercer conflicts. But the joy of the real Christian is in that beacon-light of hope, pointing to the end of life's turmoils, and revealing eternal day replete with sweet soul-rest, and the wreath, made of the laurels of victory, achieved through the sorrowful labors of Christian pilgrimage. Life is a labor, and nothing conduces more to health, happiness and real spiritual growth than exercise of both body and soul in all innocent activity. Creation never rests, only as continual growth and change produce rest. Beautiful humanity, like the luscious fruits and brilliant flowers, is one of the higher productions of this ever-creating fountain. Let us remember that our humanity is capable of large development, increasing use and beauty, earthly and heavenly; and those whose lives have felt the baptism of Christ, realize that, while they live, work, and sorrow for the good, the better and best are just beyond.

REWARD OF LIFE.

—O—
ELIZABETH H. WEBSTER.

"Blessed are they that do His commandments that they may have the right to the tree of life."

John while "in the spirit" on Patmos.

"Blessed, or happy and spiritually prospered, are those who keep the commandments of Jesus," not merely the code of laws, given to the early Law-giver, but the "new commandment," which surpasses them all in that it comprehends the whole, with greater reaches of love, unity and unselfishness.

"The law was a school-master to bring them to Christ;" and by obeying the former they gained the power to fulfill the still higher requirements of the latter. By "denying self," they learn to love the neighbor so well that they can "sing joyfully the song of Moses," "with the Spirit and the understanding," and the still sweeter song of the Lamb, the Christ-spirit.

They are to "have right to the tree of life," because "they are worthy," as the Revelator says of those "who enter into the Holy City through the gates" of confession, justice, consecration and purity.

But what is this tree of life, to which they have right, which "bears twelve kinds of fruit?" Is it not something of which they may partake continually, as there is a constant succession of fruits, which will afford them cheer, strength, all needful sustentation, and keep them in life and vigor? It is a tree of life, not of death. So much so, that those who have not, by obedience to these physical and spiritual laws, gained a right to the fruit, may still find benefit and healing, even from its "leaves," or the less concentrated nutriment of the fruit. If they cannot, by obedience to the whole law, become "every whit whole," body and spirit, they may find a healing principle, even in the leaves, or scattering truths, eliminated by the growth of these germ principles.

A PROPHECY.

—o—
WATSON ANDREWS.

THE pentecostal wave, many fold redoubled, shall again descend and sweep with giant force throughout the world. No sect, party, scheme nor combinations will avail to quench its fires, nor turn its resistless tide one tittle from its course; but onward, ever onward, o'er thrones and kingdoms it shall roll, when wrong of every name and nature — princely, priestly and pecuniary — shall be swept from the earth. Other Pauls and Peters shall arise on whom the cloven tongues of fire will again descend, and burning words in thunder tones shall leap from off their glowing altars, and set a waking world on fire! Repentant cries shall break the midnight gloom, and tears like rain-drops lay the rising dust. Oh God! be mine so to live now, that love and not repentance shall then melt my soul to tears.

THE SHAKER.

Monthly — 60 cents per annum.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

THE SHAKER TO ITS READERS— GREETING.

—o—

WITH hopeful and happy greetings to universal humanity, THE SHAKER enters upon its sixth annual volume. Though returning to its original title, it would be understood to amplify rather than detract dual principles, in all things which the name Shaker and Shakeress could imply. Advocating truths which have their foundation in the belief of God's duality and the duality of Christ, THE SHAKER will illustrate the fruits of such belief by the presentation to the world of a brotherhood and sisterhood in Christ, where impartiality of rights is fully prevailing — in a perfected Shaker organization.

The present management take this early opportunity of bestowing unqualified approval and commendation upon their earnest and faithful predecessors, who have been so long and favorably known within and without "the household of faith," as unflinching foes of error, and advocates of all that is pure and good; who have so unselfishly labored for our little Monthly, that they have neglected duties demanded of them by the model organizations at whose heads they preside. Thanking them in behalf of humanity, we believe "all the people will say, amen!" Elder F. W. EVANS assumed control of THE SHAKER at "a time which tried our souls" as by fire, and now that he feels the autumn of his life more real than ever, it seems happily opportune that we relieve him — than whom none could be more loving, fatherly, nor more practically Christian. We crave his mantle. In the immediate future THE SHAKER will be conducted in behalf of the United Societies by G. A. Lomas, as Editor, and N. A. Briggs as Publisher.

OUR STANDARD BEARER.

—o—

FRIENDS, of whatever name, sect, sex, color or condition, "lend us a hearing:" Christ having laid the grandest of foundations, we purpose standing thereon; thence we will move more heavenward, less earthward, and thence lift our Standard upon whose folds is inscribed an undying opposition to the popular inclination — secession from Christ-practices for selfish purposes — against which inclination the Christ-life enters a continual and righteous protest. On our Standard we would represent the principles of Jesus "lifted up," hoping to draw the attention, at least, of "all men and women unto them." Nor would we be chargeable with faults of commission nor omission. If our Standard invites to any thing which finds no relation to the Christ-life, we will reject it as soon as discovered; and if we fail to append sufficient cross, self-denial, or progress unto increasing salvation, we are open to such conviction, and will immediately make the addenda. We have risen in love with the life of Christ — it is our criterion — and THE SHAKER is our bearer of "glad tidings of great joy." In all our theological reasoning we shall urge the beauties of the Christ-life; and the power that proceeds from true holiness will be the force with which we will attract, invite and convert the world!

It will readily be admitted that THE SHAKER is pre-eminent as a periodical in its peculiar field, towering "above all the surrounding hills" of journalism, in its testimony of radical Christianity. This testimony condemns no good thing of nature, but presents, as superlatively spiritual and Christ-like, the following general principles: A VIRGIN LIFE, as opposed to all fleshly lusts. It accepts the whole COMMUNAL system of the church of pentecost — the model church — adding thereto the grand feature of organization for both sexes. PEACE of household and nation is equally advocated by it. It teaches the efficacy of CONFESSION, and the eternal relinquishment of error, and to keep unspotted from the world, by a clean separation of its Church from all State politics and governmental policy. Until there shall appear a publication demanding a purer life than THE SHAKER advocates, more peace, more "all things in common," less rich and less poor, and a higher degree of unspottedness from all worldly lusts, BRETHREN, SISTERS, be proud of and work for our Standard Bearer. Send it your best thoughts on religion and science generally, on philosophy, physiology, on cooking and all domestic duties; on farming, gardening, building, mechanical improvements and moral truths. Illustrate more fully our social life as it is, or should be; sing blessed songs, and proclaim our terrestrial and eternal advantages in gospel life. Let us tell the whole world from what we are saved, and how ardent we are to save others. Criticise us keenly and as kindly. We believe in the ushering in of a brighter day. We know the gospel in its full presentation "is sure recompense for all we've left behind," and we mean to use it in endeavoring to answer "WHAT IS TRUTH?" Gospel friends, take heart!

"There's a light about to beam,
"There's a midnight darkness changing into gray;
"Aid its dawning, tongue and pen;
"Aid it, hopes of honest men (and women),
"Aid it paper, aid it type,
"Aid it for the hour is ripe,
"And our earnest must not slacken into play."

TRIBUTE AND CRITICISM.

—o—

T. L. Harris says: "The dear and worthy Shakers have seen it (1); they have taken into their hearts the fact that seortation is a serpent that stings even to the second death, and that social antagonism is the result of disorderly sex-relation. They have based a system on the negation of sex (2), and the annihilation of individual interest. Their chastity has been denied by the vile, and their sincerity and honesty doubted by religionists; but upon a ground hedged in by the necessary limitations of their theory, who shall dare say that their work has not (3) been faithful and praiseworthy? Yet starved hearts and lonely lives, affectional want in the midst of material plenty, stamp their system on the positive ground, a failure (4)!"

(1) The author of the above refers, first, to solidarity — a consolidation of interests — and we have seen it and practiced it, moderately successful, for a century! and we believe "seortation" — lewdness — to be fully as effective as he strongly puts it. (2) "Negation of sex!" Never. We fully acknowledge the order and rights of sex. We make one pay tribute to the other in all that concerns Christian life. There are those yet living who believe the Shakers hate each other as sexes; never speak to one another, eat apart and sleep in separate houses. We have yet to see, outside of Shakerdom, the manifestation of Christian love among the sexes, free from seortation, as may be daily witnessed in Shaker societies, where the gospel is kept alive in the soul. A greater freedom in love, and with equal purity, we challenge the whole world to present. The perfect tense (3) "has," might, with equal propriety, be supplanted by the present tense "is."

There may be "starved hearts, lonely lives and affectional want," but neither of these are found in a living Shaker. Neither spiritual nor material poverty come in at our doors, while we are exercised in the simplest Shakerism; and, hence, no love needs fly from our windows.

We admit that our system is not yet perfectly practiced, neither socially nor in the "annihilation of individual interests," etc.; but, while "we will not tarry by the way," we wish T. L. Harris, who has been trying so many years, or some one else, would succeed in establishing an improvement on Shaker societies, where there were less "starved hearts" and just as little or less "seortation;" less "lonely lives" and more spiritual protection; much less "affectional want" and more "material abundance," accompanied by as many or more angel brethren and sisters! Truly, we feel our leanness, but not by comparison with any thing on the earth as yet; and until some better way is established that will make better Christians of carnal men and women than our system proposes, we should be permitted — knowing no such word as (4) "failure" — to rejoice that "the gospel is full recompense for all we've left behind."

—0—

THAT the first mission of the Christ was of an entirely missionary character, while the second was to be solely devoted to organization, are ideas of too general acceptance by BELIEVERS, but they are incorrect. They have been the causes of many lost opportunities for human salvation. We are living illustrations of the fact, that the sexes can live on earth in all purity, reflecting the type of the heavenly model; we have evidenced to the world the possibility and Christian necessity of establishing, on a durable basis, a pentecostal commune, wherein we can realize how good it is for Christians to dwell together in unity; and are led by the spirit to confess our sins, and to urge our souls into a living repentance therefrom. We realize, through our temporal and spiritual blessings, that the gospel is very good to us; and we may be, through this realization, fostering a selfishness that loses to us opportunities of telling the good news: "WHO-SOEVER WILL, LET THEM COME!" The second advent of Christ teaches evangelism, even at much expense to us; for, if the gospel is so good to us, is it not our duty to use and to make every opportunity serviceable in spreading the gospel?

We have been "watching, and waiting, and praying in earnest," that the heavens would do something for us, and without any further expense to us; and we have found that the evangelism that has cost so little, true to the philosophy of cause and effect, has been equally valuable in its results. The heavens are undoubtedly "waiting in earnest" for us to lose no more opportunities for saving souls and blessing the Cause.

One of "the wise men of the East" sends us a timely warning, in this number of THE SHAKER, to be on the alert during the season of revivals which is apparently approaching, and to cast in our nets. Bear in mind that a people possessing so many waves of pentecostal influence to baptize souls with, we, as Shakers, have been to the least expense in evangelism of any church in our own or any other land. We know of a people less than one-tenth our number and ability, who, in one line of evangelization, as seems to them good, spend annually more than double the cost of our MONTHLY for a twelve-month, and for which they desire and receive only spiritual returns. One family of our ORDER, which has expended most in the diffusion of our gospel principles, testifies that every dollar and exertion have been more than returned. Others, individuals, assert their willingness to give one meal daily; to do with less in several respects, if necessity requires, so that the gospel eagle may continue to fly. Our time and ability, that may be requisite, are given; nevertheless, relying on the generosity of brethren at home, abroad, and "those not of our fold as yet," we believe we shall be substantially paid. Let us all have sufficient faith in God, and love for humanity, to spend and be spent for the Cause. We will, undoubtedly, receive help from those "without," who would be numbered with those "within." But let us first show all humanitarians that we have a confidence in the truths we preach, equal to our last dollar and exertion, and as God liveth there will be no more lost opportunities, and the returns from every effort will be manifold. *

TRUST.

ELIZABETH B. HARRISON.

LIFE seems to be a matter of continual trust—we constantly trust, and are trusted. We are taught to put our trust in God, and truly, we need no other reminders of this necessity, than the ordinary affairs of life. We needfully and thankfully trust one another, and are ever most grateful, when we know that our trust has not been misplaced. We have, by the provisions of the gospel, been placed in trust of large temporal possessions; and if we abuse our trust, we shall be recompensed by an equal feeling of want. There are many effects of mistrust, that will need the correction of the spiritual world. Thank God, I know how to trust my Ministry, Elders, Brethren and Sisters—those in temporal care, and those bearing spiritual burdens. Those who are trusted in largest confidence, will not so easily betray trust, as when suspected.

The greatest trust committed to any, is the pure gospel of Christ, and being placed in this trust, even so would I live, not as pleasing self, but God who trusts, yet will try all our hearts.

—0—

MARIA WITHAM.

As gentle flowers inhale the dew,
So thirsts my soul for light;
Each day supplies my wants anew,
While e'er I walk aright.

And in Christ's gospel there is power
To set my spirit free;
Its light will lead me, every hour,
"Nearer, my God to thee!"

It fills me with that perfect peace—
Gives me a lowly mind;
By it, I learned that sovereign grace,
My soul sought long to find.

GOLDEN SAYINGS.

—0—

"SEE! I HAVE CULLED THE FLOWERS THAT PROMISED BEST."

ONE of the best "confessions of faith" ever devised, is a straightforward, useful, cheery, consistent Christian life, seven days in the week.

... I would not give much for your religion unless it can be seen. Lamps do not talk, but they do shine. A light-house sounds no drum, it heats no gong, and yet, far over the waters, its friendly spark is seen by the mariner. So let your actions shine out your religion. Let the main sermons of your life be illustrated by your conduct, and it shall not fail to be illustrious.

... Character is an eternal temple that each one begins to rear, yet death only can complete. The finer the architecture, the more fit for the indwelling of angels.

... In deciding questions of truth and duty, remember that the wrong side has a crafty and powerful advocate in your own heart.

... "None were horn to command the Golden Rule; but all to obey it."—S. A. Neal.

... The principles of godliness are as old as time, and new as the moment.—Ibid.

—0—

DANIEL FRASER.

—0—

HUMAN SOCIETY, No 1.

LOOKING over the surface of modern civilization, we see that almost every thing is in motion, and that which will not move is left behind, and speedily becomes obsolete.

In mechanical matters the displays of adaptations are wonderful. On the one hand there are manifestations of herculean power; on the other, microscopical delicacy of execution. Astronomy, soaring aloft, outstrips her old friend astrology, and actually foretells future events. Chemistry no longer confines herself to inorganic matter, but has taken possession of a whole kingdom of vital forces, and has already advanced to, and is now ready, to introduce us to a world of invisible, and, I may almost say, omnipotent forces. Physiology, akin to chemistry, treads also on the confines of spirit life, teaching that obedience to her laws, forms, or mal-forms, civilizations; and that our social standing, intellectual progress, our religious conditions and elevation, must be predicated upon her. Disobedience to physiological law brings upon us bodily disease, early death, distress of mind, domestic distractions, social broils and national convulsions, and associates us with Egypt-loving Jews and with the giant sinners of the antediluvian world.

History informs us of the rise of nations and the fall of empires. The rise of a people and their ruin, is but a chapter in physiology. One of the caliphs remarked: "As long as you stick to your plain way of living, you will prosper." In other words, obedience to physiological law is inseparably connected with individual integrity, moral and national power. His people did not stick to their plain way of living; the consequence is, that, at this hour, they are a contemptible nation, and, had it not been for the interference of two powerful neighbors, history would have written ere now, "The Saracenic empire is no more."

The foundations of morals, social life, peace, health and heaven, must ever rest upon physiology. It is the ground on which Jacob's ladder stands—the medium by which pure intelligences can reach us with heavenly gifts, and bear joyful tidings back to spirit friends.

Turning to sacred history, we find that the first sin was an act of sensuality. Tracing the consequences down through antediluvian times, we read that it was disobedience, first, to physiological law, and then to moral law, which brought the flood, a catastrophe second only to the entire destruction of our planet. Again, we read that it was obedience to physiological law which saved Noah and his family. It was said of him, "that he was perfect" in generating Shem, Ham and Japheth, while those around him were disorderly. After the flood, for what reason was the father of the faithful called to leave his pagan home? Was it not that physiological law, and those that rest upon it, might be observed? For what end were all the wonders in Egypt performed, and why did Sinai shake, but that physiological and moral law might be unshaken? Why did the Israelites forsake the worship of the true and living God for gods of wood and stone; was it not that they might give license to their appetites, and eat, drink and procreate without restraint? Why was it that the God of their fathers threw them off, and left them a reproach before all nations? Because they first violated physiological law, and then they violated every other law. Why are heathens, heathens? Because they have no respect for physiological law. Are there any heathens in Christian countries, so called? Those who have no respect for physiological law, whatever guise they may assume, are heathens; and, being wrong in their outer life, how can they be right in their inner? Why did the Divine man Jesus — the father of the new creation, the captain and pattern of the higher life — solemnly declare that the physiological, the moral, the Sabbatical, the financial, the sanitary, and the other laws given through Moses, should not pass till all should be fulfilled? Because he knew that the people of the better day, who would live his life, would keep them every jot, not by constraint, but willingly.

 FULL and careful analysis of the Tomato fruit, recently made, explodes the growing idea, that it develops, if it does not produce cancer. Packed in cans, it is not so wholesome as in earthen or glass; but it is wholesome, in any form, unless doctored extensively by the cooks.

 Colds: Many colds, and extremely bad coughs, originate from so bundling the throat that a perspiration is created, opening the pores, which come in contact with the cold air. Better leave the throat only covered by a loose collar, excepting when going out in the wind or cold; then be particular not to dress the throat so warmly as to perspire. Be fully as particular, about not warming up too quickly after being very cold, as about wrapping up when ready to go out in the cold. Avoid excessive use of grease, and keep the bowels regular.

 Americans are gradually waking up to the fact that oatmeal is by no means an unimportant article of diet. As a food, the merits of which have stood the test of centuries, and which is designed to promote the sanitary condition of the nation by laying the foundation for more ready and vigorous framers for the coming generation, let us regard its general adoption as an article of diet as nothing short of a national good. Its phosphorescent qualities act as a general and healthful impulse to the brain, and on no other food can one endure so great or so prolonged mental labor as on oatmeal porridge. Properly cooked, it is not only a most healthful and nutritious food, but it is fully attested by its wonderfully rapid adoption as a popular diet by the very fastidious palates of our American people. — American Working People.

 The Boston Journal of Chemistry regrets that the millers use all their finest, soundest wheat for fine flour, and the poorest for graham or brown bread, a general name given to mixtures of bran and spoiled flour. "What we need is good, sweet, whole wheat flour, finely ground and put up securely for family use, and any Western miller who will give his earnest attention to furnishing such flour will realize a fortune speedily; securing the most nutritive principles the Creator has stored up for man's food."

 Supposing your age to be fifteen, or thereabouts:

You have 200 bones and 500 muscles; your blood weighs twenty-five pounds, your heart is five inches in length and three inches in diameter, it beats seventy times per minute, 4,200 times per hour, 100,800 times per day, and 36,792,000 times per year. At each beat a little over two ounces of blood is thrown out of it; and each day it receives and discharges about seven tons of that wonderful fluid.

Your lungs will contain a gallon of air, and you inhale 21,000 gallons per day. The aggregate surface of the air-cells of your lungs, supposing them to be spread out, exceeds 20,000 square inches.

The weight of your brain is three pounds; when you are a man it will weigh about eight ounces more.

Your nerves exceed 10,000,000 in number.

Your skin is composed of three layers, and varies from one-fourth to one-eighth of an inch in thickness. The area of your skin is about 1,700 square inches. Each square inch contains about 2,500 sweating tubes or perspiratory pores, each of which may be likened to a little drain tile one-fourth of an inch long, making an aggregate length of the entire surface of your body of 88,541 feet, or a tile ditch for draining the body almost 17 miles long. — Science of Health.

SPIRIT OF THE FARM.

EXPERIMENTS in milking cows, twice and thrice a day, were sufficiently in favor of the third milking to more than double the value, over the extra cost. An analysis of the milk in summer, also proved the third milking favorable to health.

.... From careful experiments, made under the supervision of Lord Kincaid, of Scotland, we have most valuable conclusions concerning manures, covered, or lying in open yards:

Potatoes treated with barnyard manure:

One acre produced 272 bushels.

One acre produced 292 bushels.

Potatoes manured from the covered sheds:

One acre produced 442 bushels.

One acre produced 471 bushels.

The next year the land was sown with wheat, when the crop was as follows:

Wheat on land treated with barnyard manure:

One acre produced 41 bushels, 18 pounds (of 61 pounds per bushel).

One acre produced 42 bushels, 38 pounds (of 61 pounds per bushel).

Wheat on land manured from covered sheds:

One acre produced 55 bushels, 5 pounds (of 61 pounds per bushel).

One acre produced 58 bushels, 47 pounds (of 61 pounds per bushel).

The straw also yielded one-third more upon the land fertilized with the manure from the covered stalls than upon that to which the ordinary manure was applied.

... A western farmer, raising and keeping on his estate, a stock of three thousand nine, testifies that his experience proves that eornstalks, cut into pieces, similar to chaff, and made into slop, produce more milk, and keep the stock in better condition than the best of hay. Sheep, also, thrive better on stalks, of sweet variety, when cut very fine, than on clover! Is not this why milkmen use so many?

STARTING AN APPLE NURSERY.

NICHOLAS A. BRUGGS.

SELECT a good, rich soil and well drained. If not already rich, make it so by a generous application of well-decomposed barnyard manure; none of your patent fertilizers.

Late in autumn sow pomace from selected apples, in drills three feet apart, and cover with one inch of earth. But a small portion of the ground intended for the nursery will be required the first year.

When the young trees appear in the spring, thin them out, leaving them one inch apart. A few weeks later thin to four inches, taking care to reserve the largest and healthiest plants; for the superior thriftiness manifest at this stage of growth will be likely to continue with the growth of the trees.

Hoe frequently during the season. As winter again approaches, dig up the young trees; pack them with sand in small boxes, place them in a cellar, and occasionally sprinkle the sand to keep it moderately moist.

At any time during the winter the trees may be engrafted as follows: Obtain good, thrifty cions of the previous season's growth from trees of the desired variety, cutting them into pieces of two or three buds each.

Make a cement of pitch or resin and tallow, sufficiently soft to spread with a brush while warm. Spread a thin coat of this material on tough paper, and cut into strips of about one-fourth of an inch in width. Now take from the sand one of the little trees, and with a sharp knife cut it squarely off above the root, at the place indicating the surface of the ground while growing. Make a transverse incision in the root portion an inch below the first cut, inclining the knife slightly downward. Split the stock lengthwise, so as to remove one-half. Select a cion of corresponding size, and prepare it in the same manner, so that when the two pieces are joined they will nicely fit each other. Now take a strip of the prepared paper, and, commencing below the incision, wind it spirally, so as to completely cover the joined parts and hold them firmly in place. Replace the trees in the sand, cover fully the spliced section, and in the spring the pieces will be found to have adhered, ready to grow, when again placed in the sand. Care should be taken, particularly during the first season after engrafting, to keep the splice covered with earth.

TRIMMING APPLE TREES.

F. W. EVANS.

Now, not in the spring, is the time to trim apple trees. Limbs, of any size, cut off the sooner after the crop is gathered, the better, will heal kindly, and the stump will remain clean and white.

At this time, the strength of the whole system will be turned to repair the wound, and to perfect buds for another season's crop. If the orchardist understands his business, he will, as soon as possible after removing the fruit, take off every dead limb, and superfluous branch; scrape the body, and wash it with strong soap suds, or lye that will nearly float an egg. Dig round the trees and manure them. Then, if the borer, the caterpillar, or any thing else deters the trees from bearing next season, charge it to Providence! Who will demonstrate the best time for trimming, by cutting off a block from limbs, the first of each month, and present to some agricultural society's museum? The pieces will vary, from a bright wood color, to a black canker, unsightly, and yet conclusively passing the verdict.

PHILOSOPHER'S BRANCH.

WHAT is the Sun? Professor Rudolph, in a lengthy paper on the sun, says: A molten or white hot mass, 856,000 miles in diameter, equaling in bulk 1,260,000 worlds like our own, having a surrounding ocean of gas on fire, 50,000 miles deep, tongues of flame darting upward more than 50,000 miles, volcanic forces that hurl into the solar atmosphere luminous matter to the height of 160,000 miles; drawing to itself all the worlds belonging to our family of planets, and holding them all in their proper places; attracting with such superior force the millions of solid and stray masses that are wandering in the fathomless abyss, that they rush helplessly toward him, and fall into his fiery embrace. And thus he continues his sublime and restless march through his mighty orbit having a period of more than 18,000,000 of years.

It is applicable to cellars, packing-rooms, compartments in ships, etc., and is intended to keep the air in the rooms pure, dry and very cold, without the use of ice.

... An inch of rain is of more consequence than would be generally supposed. On an acre of ground it amounts to 6,272,640 cubic inches. This gives 22,622.5 gallons of water, which would fill a cistern capable of holding 360 hogsheads. Reducing it to weight, it would amount to over 113 tons. A trough 121 feet long, 10 feet high, and 3 feet wide, inside measurement, would just contain an inch of rain from an acre of ground.

JUDGMENT.

RELIGIOUSLY born and religiously educated, we have a high appreciation of sacred history. Jonah, as appears, was a prophet of the Lord — unwillingly so. The whale was elected or appointed, to teach the prophet the way of submission.

But really, what have we to do with Jonah, or with his whale? With the people of Nineveh, we have something to do. They rise up in judgment.

Where, in the world's history, find we a nation, a people, a city, against whom the Ninevites rise not up in judgment?

Religious organizations, in special manner, stand condemned before high heaven, by the example of Nineveh.

The nearer right a religious organization has been, when it departs from the principles of its organization, the more inveterate the power behind the throne, that runs the government machine, against the prophet of the Lord, against the voice of reason.

The Lord God of Heaven is about to deal with the dwellers of his little planet; first with Organization, Political and Religious — such as are found wanting in the virtues of their founders — such as hold not fast the good of the past, and lay hold of the good of the increasing degree of Light and Life, will be found, if found at all, among the things that were, but are not.

Let those who occupy high official station, beware of the power behind the throne. Let them heed the voice of the Living God, by messengers sent unto them. Let them remember the people of Nineveh. Let them purge themselves and their people of the accursed thing; for, behold I come quickly — have come — to give unto every man and every woman, according as their works shall be.

INCENSE.

... Little words are the sweetest to hear; little charities fly furthest and stay longest on the wing; little flakes are the stillest; little hopes the fondest, and little farms the best tilled; little books are the most read, and little songs the dearest loved. And when nature would make any thing especially rare and beautiful, she makes it little — little pearls, little diamonds, little dew. Agar's is a model prayer, yet it is but a little one, and the burden of the petition is but for little. The sermon on the mount is little, life is made up of little; death is what remains of them all. Day is made up of little beams, and night is glorious with little stars.

... "Religious controversy is the gates of hell." Elder F. W. Evans.

... Be careful! A certain Shaker preacher, expatiating upon the beauties, and Christian necessity, of the "all things common" doctrine, attempted a "golden saying" thus: * * * "So closely do we attempt to follow this Christian rule, that we have given up a dollar's worth of property. Nothing that we have is our own, but Society's; even the clothes I have on my person are not mine." A lady in the audience, hearing the address, complimented the young man freely, and then added: "If the clothes he had on were borrowed, he borrowed them of some body who was just of his size!" Shaker preachers, be careful of what you say.

SOCIETY RECORD.

MT. LEBANON: The new "Zion's" House is still an all-absorbing theme of the Church Family. They purpose finishing only the Sanctuary this winter, which will be ready for use by the early part of the new year, at least — warmed by steam, lighted by gas. Some minor, but necessary, buildings are now being built. The North Family have been doing a wonder. A large reservoir capable of holding more than 7,582 hogsheads, or nearly a half million gallons of water, has been built about 600 feet from the dwellings, and at a height sufficient to throw, by its own weight, over the highest of their buildings. The reservoir is fed from a pond a quarter of a mile distant, and conveyed from the reservoir through iron pipes five and six inches in diameter.

WATERVLIET, N. Y.: It is ever pleasant to record a free use of paint. The Church Family of this place looks almost new, some seven or eight large buildings having been re-covered with paint. An external observer remarked: "They are making Zion shine!" Jesse Wells, nearly a hundred years old, the last of the famous family of that name, is the oldest man in Albany county.

HANCOCK: 300 rods of stone wall, and half-stone wall, have been built recently; several new buildings erected, and much painting done. Several roofs of slate and tin have been applied. A pamphlet on "The Origin of Life and Species" has just been published here. Few places can report more enterprise than Hancock.

ENFIELD, N. H.: The most noted feature we learn from here is the departure for superior heaven of Mother Abigail Bowdoin, whose death will be found in our obituary section. She was sixteen months old when Believers first opened their testimony in N. H., 92 years and 9 months previous to her death.

SHIRLEY VILLAGE: A large reservoir is being erected here also. Water is brought from a never-failing spring three-fourths of a mile. After removing about 2,000 loads of muck for the bed of the immense cistern, a kind of clay was reached, which, when burnt, surpasses the famous Bath brick, commonly used for cleaning cutlery.

ENFIELD, CONN.: Cemetery here vastly improved by marble headstones. Church lately painted; canal banks strengthened at much cost. Crops abundant. Six bushels of pine (white) seed planted! New railroad, running, within 125 rods of buildings.

MUSIC (No. 1).

—o—
JAMES G. RUSSELL.To the Editor of The Shaker:

As a sincere lover of the beautiful gift of singing, which forms such a conspicuous part of religious services throughout almost the entire Christian world, the humble writer would seek to portray his feelings upon this interesting topic through the medium of the pen. Doubtless, other minds more active and talented would do far greater justice to the subject, still this article may do no less than to enter, as a befitting contribution to our little missionary paper, bespeaking the feelings and views of an honest advocate of musical truths. First, music, according to the general acceptance of the term, may be defined as "instrumental or vocal harmony"—a combination of sounds agreeable to the ear. But the question arises, how are these sounds to be made agreeable to the ear? Are they the productions of an unqualified or untutored performer? Admitting the fact that within the human organism are found the germs of this beautiful talent, it is only through culture that we attain to that degree of development, that the rendering becomes agreeable and pleasing to the listener, or easy and unaffected to the performer. Hence, it is evident that, for the accomplishment of this end, scientific appliances must be brought to our aid. The laws of one of the primary divisions of the musical department known by the term melody, require that the various sounds entering into a musical performance, be recognized as bearing a certain relation to each other. This relation or arrangement called the scale, or gamut, discloses the proper intervals that must be given in music. These intervals are known by the general terms. Major seconds and minor seconds require, on the part of the singer, a great deal of care to be given correctly, and thereby sustain the proper pitch of tone. If, for example, in attempting to give the tones designated as the fourth and fifth from the first note of the gamut, the voice should disclose an imperfect major second; the effect must, of necessity, be very unsatisfactory to a sensitive and well cultivated ear, and the same may be said of any interval throughout the entire range of the musical gamut. This defect, when apparent either in harmonious or simple melodies, results in what is generally termed "flattening from the key." In order to remedy this defect so generally prevalent among the untutored songsters of our day, many facts must be considered and taken into account. First, the voice must be correctly and thoroughly trained to the proper intonations of the scale, which may be accomplished best by a thoroughly qualified teacher—a living, practical example in vocal music. It is an established fact in the minds of many musicians, that the ear may become so accustomed to imperfect intonations, that false tones may be taken for true ones, and vice versa. An apt illustration of this fact recently came under the writer's observation. It was related to him by a prominent musician, who was also officiating quite extensively in the tuning of instruments, that on going his rounds for that purpose, he observed a certain piano to be quite out of tune. The player, who was first troubled with its imperfections, but at last became accustomed to them, remarked that "it had been out of tune, but HAD GOT AGAIN ALL RIGHT OF ITSELF!" Is this not too customary? Such seems to be the case with many untutored singers. From a neglect of proper training, the tone is given quite below its proper position, and the ear having become accustomed to the imperfection, fails in its responsible office and takes the false tone for the true one. Another important fact to be taken into account is, the difference in the extension or compass of human voices. While some are capacitated to reach an exceedingly high point, but unable to go very low, others are able to go very low but unable to go very high. Still another class of voices finds its great field of effect between the two extremes, unable to go very high, and equally unable to go very low, yet having a greater compass than either of the other classes, as its compass embraces all the intermediate portion between the two extremes. From this fact, arises the necessity of arranging music, in a style that will meet best the capacity of these different classes of voices, and when the means are neglected to accomplish this, we find each class of voices in its turn striving beyond its proper limits, and by so doing we experience the dissatisfactory result of flattening from the key. It is just as unreasonable to suppose that a low, bass voice is to do justice to a musical performance, or to itself, even, while lamely groping up in the chambers of a treble or tenor part of music, as to suppose that a voice naturally light and high should be able to find its desirable effect down in the cellars of an alto or bass, and yet all of this is presupposed, whenever a piece of melody is congregationally attempted. And furthermore, in connection with this all-important point of voice training, there is a physiological side to be viewed and considered, which must find its place for commentation in a future chapter upon the subject of music.

COME, AND BE SAVED.

—O—

JANE EMILY SMITH.

"Whosoever will, let them come."

O, ye who are halting on Babylon's plain,
Come hither and seek the new birth —
Be stripped of your idols, seek heaven to gain,
By bearing the cross here on earth.
Come, taste of the sweets which in Zion are found,
By those who the full price will pay;
O list to the trumpet, and greet the glad sound,
"From Babylon, come, come away!"

Come Fathers, come Mothers, come dear little ones,
Who unto the kingdom are near;
O come ye loved daughters, and ye noble sons,
Your souls are most precious and dear.
Come, join the strong army of conquering souls,
Who are turning the battle within,
And freedom, her banner with beauty unfolds,
In token of victories they win.

Come ye who are sin-sick, and hunger for truth,
Or thirst for the waters of life;
O, come unto Zion, come aged or youth,
And enter the glorious strife.
The way of salvation is open for all —
Who are sick of the world and its sins —
'Tis free for the patient, who run, yet not fall,
And free for the hero who wins.

The virgins invite you to join their pure band,
And march, from the sorrows of earth,
In ways that are leading to heaven's fair land —
Thus seeking the heavenly birth.
O come from the north, from the south, east and west,
And sit down in the kingdom, with those Who from sin, death and darkness, enjoy a sweet rest,
And their joy like a river o'erflows.

AN HOUR IN THE DAY OF PROGRESS.

ELDER G. B. AVERY.

THE present is, emphatically, a revolutionary age, a day of numerous revelations and developments, of rapid transitions in science, art, morals, and religion — creedal faith or profession.

The character of Christians (so called), as a class, is being weighed in the balance against reputation; and religious creeds, as well as their professors, are being brought to the bar of judgment, to be tried by the light, which, for the last quarter of a century especially, God, through ministering instrumentalities, has been widely dispensing in some degree, throughout the world, among all people, of every nation and clime.

To us, it is manifest, this work of judgment will not stop, until it comes home to individual, even as unto creedal, denominational, national, and society life. At present, conviction for sin is, apparently, almost lost from earth; but, its advent will break forth in the near dawning of a brighter day. It will return, like a morning shower, or the evening dew; and its pearly drops will moisten the arid deserts of soul experience, and make plants of life to bloom there luxuriantly.

The crucible is heating, to apply the crucial tests to professions of religion, by revealed Christian principles of righteousness. God's ministers, seen or unseen, are blowing the fire!

Let honest, sin-sick souls, through all the land, rally to this crucial standard, and enlist; for God has so constituted the human soul it cannot live (though it may exist in death) without religion; and the time is rapidly dawning when irrational professions of religion, together with mere professors, will have to take backgrounds among the dishonorable.

HOPE.

—O—

ANNA ERVING.

As the earth, when parched by drought, suffers for want of the refreshing showers, so does the agonized spirit mourn the loss of hope. But, when our spirits have been depressed by sorrow, is there one of us but has felt and received courage from some kindly friend that has bid us to hope? Have not breezes of fragrant thoughts been wafted over us, as if an angel had shaken from his wings the odors of paradise? Hope is one expression of God's enduring love for man, and ever encircles him as the light of day to guide and strengthen him while on his earthly pilgrimage. But, not alone from sources above and around, does he receive this soul-lifting boon; for within the human heart is a hopeful fountain, ever welling up fresh and pure, when not exhausted by neglect, nor hidden by despair. Hope is the connecting link between the past and future; the cheering ray that ever brightens the present; it blooms in every season of existence, and, like the evergreen, preserves its verdure throughout the year. Oh, how bright and beautiful is hope! when I feel its magic influence within me, my courage is restored; my drooping energies are renewed, and my heart goes out in thanks to thee, my God! I thank thee for the daily blessings I enjoy, while I have faith to believe I shall merit the fulness of thy goodness in the future, when my spirit shall have passed the narrow confines of mortality, and have entered the realm of eternal life and heavenly felicity. God hath provided the balm of hope, to cheer and soothe the sufferer. Oftentimes as the poor prisoner weeps in hopeless agony of spirit, a gentle voice whispers "hope;" he feels he is an outcast from God and man. Again the voice whispers, "God loveth all;" he trembles as though in the presence of a superior, yet unknown power. Hope, at length, penetrates the suffering spirit, and inspires the degraded one with new life; with a zeal to work for the redemption of his blemished character. Oh, how thankful he feels, what joy elates him! what inexpressible happiness fills his being; he longs to impart his simple experience to every guilty brother on earth; he is now happy under the influence of hope; it has helped him to better his condition! How good is God, how precious is hope!

HUMAN SOCIETY. NO. 2.

—O—

DANIEL FRASER.

REFERRING to the advances of science, and to all the progress of our day, may we ask, what are the moral, the religious and physiological manifestations of Christendom? Do we not find that four millions of persons in Ireland have died from want of food through land monopoly? And that four millions more of British subjects, in India, have perished in a similar manner, and from the same cause?

We are all aware that one of the most destructive wars of modern times was begun and carried on for years, simply that four millions of persons — the docile, the loving, the devotional African — might be held in perpetual vassalage. Do we not see the red man of the American continent, the worshiper of the Great Spirit, driven from his forest home, and withering under the influence of what is called Christian civilization? Are not these enormities but the crests of the great waves of the deep and wide current of "man's inhumanity to man?" Do we not see, at this very hour, Europe bristling with bayonets? its best blood abstracted from useful labor, and trained to the art of war — the art of destroying life and property? Has the reign of the Prince of Peace yet reached us? is there for him a quiet resting place amid such ungodly turmoil? Are not the so-called Christian governments based on fraud and sustained by violence? Instead of protecting the laboring poor, do they not rob them and crush their spirits?

When we turn to the domestic life of men and women, what do we behold? Do we find physiological and moral law reigning supremely, or do not the effects of violations of the procreative and nutritive functions fill the land with feebleness, disease and death? Is there one person in a hundred who dies a natural death? Is not the long catalogue of their diseases a testimony against their individual habits? Again, is there a single article of food or medicine capable of being manipulated, which is not adulterated? Of clothing, is it not half sham and shoddy?

It is far from being pleasant to notice such a state of things; we being members of the human family, are we not all representatives of that family? Can any one of us say, "stand off, I am organically holier than thou?"

"To see ourselves as others see us," is well, but to see ourselves in others, is a humbling gift; it is being touched as Jesus was with a feeling of human infirmity, teaching to remember, as we rise and journey upward, "the hole of the pit from whence we have been dug," and that pride and self-importance were not made for any one of us.

To conserve the good remaining in humanity, a religion based on physiological, and every other God-instituted law, is needed; a religion which worketh by love, purifies the heart and the body also—a religion in which all the bickerings of "me and mine" are eternally hushed—a religion in which the art of war is learned no more—a religion of peace, which presents a diet involving no cruelty to animals, nor violates any of the higher instincts of humanity. A finance that lendeth, but taketh no increase. An agriculture which leaveth the land bettered, and covereth up every unclean thing. A religion in perfect accord with the spirit of life, as manifested in Christ, a germ of which life inheres in every human being, which, when operative, will bring forth manifestations of God the Father, as did the well-beloved Son. A religion that accepts the human family as a unit, knows no personal distinction but that which virtue creates, and blesses all nations with an example of purity and peace.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION. NO. 2.

SCIENCE, as the term imports, is absolute knowledge. Religion, in its entirety, is the fulfillment of all the obligations of human life. "This is pure and undefiled religion before God the Father, to assist"—not merely to visit—"orphans and widows in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted from the world;" that is, this is a very essential part of pure religion, not the whole. Religion implies the utmost activity in the subject. "Whatsoever thy hands find to do, do with thy might; for in the grave" of indolence, "there is neither work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom;"—no work to preserve the bodily and mental powers in vigor; no device to create a substitute for activity; no knowledge of the Divine Life with its unlimited sources of mental, moral and spiritual supplies; and no wisdom for self-guidance along life's devious way. It implies openness of mind to receive all the truths of God from whatever intermediate source they are derived. Bigotry forms no part of religion pure and undefiled. The divine inspirations flow into every soul that is ready to receive them. "When wisdom enters into the heart, and knowledge is pleasant to the soul," they mould it into the divine image, removing by degrees the prejudices which may have accumulated there when ignorance held sway. When they are allowed to take the full control of the soul, they modify, strengthen and refine every faculty, gradually unfolding them till the merely sensual man becomes the spiritual man, and the whole is under the guidance of divine love. This is the science of the Christian life, which every one who acquaints himself with it, finds to be as clearly demonstrated to his internal consciousness, as the most precise of the exact sciences is proved to the intellectual perceptions.

Religious experience, as a science, is as widely extended as the whole human race; for it includes the experience of every one whom the divine light has awakened to a consciousness of the relations he sustains to eternal life. It embraces a knowledge of the individual self as affected by perverted tastes, appetites, affections and passions, and a knowledge of the divine power which restores these to their normal condition, purifies them from their naturally gross and sensual state, and elevates them finally to that which constitutes the life of God himself.

Religious experience includes association and conscious communion with those who partake of this life in its fullest extent. The language of Jesus and Paul in reference to this experience was not used for mere rhetorical effect,—"Ye shall see heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending;" and, "Ye are come to an innumerable company of angels, and to the spirits of just men made perfect." Their own experience corroborated the literal truth of their words.

All the sciences, whether natural, intellectual, or religious, have had various theories connected with them, which have been disproved by the accumulation of facts. The probability is that there are yet many which will finally be discarded. Dogma is not necessarily truth, fancy is not fact. This is, because man is a mere learner, with the power to ascertain truth unfolding by degrees. On this score, one science has not much to boast of over another. It is not therefore becoming in any one class to exalt their favorite science, whatever that may be, as worthy of supreme devotion. Religious science has enough in it of the really grand and beautiful to captivate every heart; and so has every other. But it is often the case that the devotee of one class of the sciences disparages others, because, in his estimation, they are of little importance. But the reason of this disparagement is his own comparative or utter ignorance of them. In reality—

"Nothing useless is or low,
Each thing in its place is best;
And what seems but idle show
Strengthens and supports the rest."

There is needed on all sides, courage to look every one of God's truths squarely in the face. Above all there is needed that candor which will induce every one to study carefully that error, in his own mind at least, shall not usurp the place of truth. At some time in the future there will be a oneness in the perception of truth, but not until every possible means is used to eliminate error from whatever bears the name of science. Then divine principles will bear the completest sway in the soul, producing harmony throughout. The thoughts, taking their coloring from the internal harmony, will be orderly and consistent, and actions, as streams from their fountains, will accord with the internal condition. This alone can constitute the heaven to which Divine Wisdom points.

MARION PATRICK.

IN reflecting on the subject of religion, we are led to consider the saying of the wise Solomon: "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." Religion is a cheerful and happy practice; its neglect brings sadness and melancholy. That religion demands of us the renunciation of all enjoyments in life, reserving nothing to balance the sacrifice, is a sad mistake, and is a fearful drawback to its advancement among mankind. How much wiser and better mankind would be, were all endowed with the full conviction that true happiness consists in the cultivation and exercise of all christian virtues! As the gentle dew falls on the flowers to revive their drooping leaves, so should religion inspire the spirit, and renew its latent energies in times of affliction; and remain as an abiding solace for all the trials we may be brought to endure. The beauty of a truly religious life is one of its valued recommendations. It teaches us how to live, to merit one another's respect and love; contributes to our present comfort and future happiness; is an invaluable gem which shines brightest in adversity; a sterling jewel that imparts godly impulses to the heart, and a gentle spirit that leads to a far better world. Its influence calms the ruffled scenes of life; gives assurance of an endless happiness, and is a steadfast anchor to the soul. It shows itself in benevolent actions, proceeding from the most unselfish motives, knows not the lust of power, nor seeks its own preferment. Its creed is, "DO GOOD, love mercy, and walk humbly before God." Its sect is the pure in heart wherever found, and its index, Him who went about doing good—illustrating the spirit of God in the human heart.

THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION.

[The following letters explain themselves. Those who have read of Elder F. W. Evans' masterly address, at the above Convention, will be interested with the supplement he adds, at the close of Dr. Miller's indorsement of nearly all therein contained.*]

DEAR FATHER EVANS:

You have got at the fundamental principles of some of the most important reforms the world has ever known. On the subjects of air, water and land, no one can dispute the fact, that these should be free to all the inhabitants of the world. Every person born has a right to food, to water, and a place to live. The very fact of existence ought to establish this in the minds of all thinking people. That water and air are free, all are ready to admit, but people seem to have an idea that the land is a subject of monopoly, and that those who happen to have money, have a right to control large tracts of land, and prevent others from occupying it. Laws should be enacted prohibiting any man from claiming possession of any more land than he can occupy and improve, and he should have no further claim to the soil on which he lives than that which comes from the products of the labor which he has placed upon that soil. Every one should have the privilege of taking possession of a certain portion of land, and making such improvements upon it as he desired. Improvements should constitute our right to the special spot which we have selected, and no person should be allowed to deprive us of it, unless we are paid for our improvements. If laws based upon this principle were enacted, what a wonderful impetus would be given to the improvements of every civilized country.

On the subject of public debt, my mind is not so well established. To illustrate: Suppose some work of great public importance is required, which the people of this generation will be compelled to make, like completing a canal or railroad, or any other vast national work, the benefits of which are to be reaped more by future generations, than by the present. In such case, I think there can be nothing objectionable in requiring succeeding generations to pay a portion of the cost. The Erie canal, I think, has been a great benefit to the people of this State. It would have imposed a very hard task on our predecessors to saddle all the cost of that canal on them, when we enjoy the benefits of it. On the same principle future generations will reap the benefits of the preservation of the Union; and it would, I think, have been clearly unfair to impose on this generation the entire expenses of the war. Yours,

E. P. MILLER.

REPLY.

DEAR DOCTOR:

So magnanimously have you admitted so many points in my article, that I can well afford to elucidate the one exception — national debts, entailed by a living generation, upon a generation unborn. At first view, your argument for debt appears plausible, if not logical. Let us look at it a little deeper. You see and admit, that "Laws, based upon the principles of Right, as set forth in the Cincinnati Convention article — equal citizenship and equality in landed property — would give wonderful impetus to improvements in every civilized country." Why so? The causes of war being removed, the concentrated energies of nations would be devoted to creating, not destroying. War-ships, monitors, rams, cannon, ammunition, rank and file of army and navy, in time of peace, like the present, would be saved as surplus capital. When right so far prevails over might, that woman co-operates with man in legislation, destructive war will be a sheer impossibility. Then a tithe of the money, now wasted in wars, will make all the improvements, in one generation, that that generation has the courage and capacity to project. Accumulated capital in property and scientific inventions will approximately annihilate space and time, by great national works, as they have already done in railroad travel and telegraphic communications.

"Owe no man any thing" — individually, nor collectively — is a sound practical maxim. Let us try it, for as many generations as we have been running in debt, and then compare results. We are so near now to total depravity, in Church and State, that almost any change will be improvement.

MT. LEBANON, N. Y. F. W. EVANS.

THE ESSENTIAL SACRIFICE.

—o—

JOS. T. CURRY.

"THE Mighty God hath spoken — 'Gather my zealous ones together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.'" These words of the Hebrew singer are better met by the Shakers than by any other order now existing. Their great principle of sexual purity is the very thing implied by the word "sacrifice". The idea came from the Mosaic tabernacle, which typified the perfect church or temple of the Living God, in which shall congregate the 144,000 sealed ones, "the first fruits unto God and the Lamb." Before the door of the tabernacle stood an altar on which was sacrificed each morning and evening a lamb — a whole burnt offering. The first one to fulfill this type was Jesus of Nazareth, of whom John the Baptist said: "Behold the Lamb of God." Jesus was a virgin, a eunuch, sacrificing, in obedience to the Father's command, the sexual propensity. He was an example of the kind of men that shall compose the temple on earth. He knew that eighteen centuries would elapse before his action and teaching would be fully appreciated, yet he announced the doctrine plainly: "There are they that have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake: he that is able to receive it, let him receive it." Here is a plain, positive commandment to those who are "able." All who believe, as the Adventists, that the kingdom of heaven is "near, even at the doors," are called by the logic of their faith to "stand with the Lamb" — "follow the Lamb" — make the sacrifice prefigured by the Lamb. No one can enter the Holy Sanctuary of Life Eternal without passing the altar at the door. They must worship at the altar, or "the door" will be "shut" against them. This altar has been erected by the Shakers, and they do right to call all of God's people to unite with them in this work. They are certainly liberal enough; saying in effect, "Believe what you please, only make the sacrifice." Having very recently become acquainted with this Society, and feeling it a duty to work with them in their inspired action, I announce myself a Shaker, giving my own construction to the word. God is a Shaker; declaring that he will "shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land." He "will shake all nations, and the desirable things of all nations shall come" into the House of God, and it shall be filled "with glory, saith the God of hosts." We must either be Shakers or be shaken. If we belong to God's army, we shall agree with him when he shakes, and will be able to stand among the "things which cannot be shaken." ENFIELD, Conn.

PRIVATE PROPERTY POSITIVELY UN-CHRISTIAN.

—o—

[Elder George R. Runyon has been speaking his mind pretty plainly to the people of Nicholasville, Ky. From the appended extracts of his address, we conclude that the Elder has lost all embarrassment when speaking the truth, if he ever had any, and forgot to sugar-coat his potion, if he intended doing so. Listen to his plain, blunt, wholesome, southern testimony *]:

"THE first Christian that ever lived, died, and went to heaven from earth, who taught all men how they might gain salvation and heaven by the merits of their own working, or their death and hell by their own demerits, was Jesus. He, the Father chose, prepared and anointed, a leading example in all holy conversation and godliness, but gave him no private property real nor personal — 'not even where to lay his head.' * * *

"Jesus and his immediate disciples formed the first Christian Association that ever blessed the earth, and they held their property in common, regardless of any previous property conditions. They ceased to walk as men, and associated with angels and angelic conditions; then followed the grand outpouring of the spirit at Pentecost, when was realized by many the divine baptism, from which property distinctions were lost forever from among God's people. Hence no member of the body of Christ has any right to the tree of life, nor to walk with angels, while holding any claims to real or personal possessions.

"From that date there has never been a genuine Christian church nor association, having rich and poor members. If individuals do not love Jesus well enough to divide their property with him, they do not sufficiently love him to keep his commandments. And, from the time of the first advent, through the time of the second, down to the present time, we know of no such thing as private-property Christians; and only acknowledge such to be Christians as sell their possessions and share with their Christian brethren as each has need; for 'inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of the brethren, ye have done it unto me!' Blessed change to all! the rich, who had gathered much, gave until the poor had no lack, and they had nothing more than the formerly poor; and as they treated one another, Jesus taught, they treated him. * * *

"If the love we have for Jesus is to be measured by the love we bear one another — and by this we are to prove our discipleship — then how many friends has Jesus in all Christendom, after all that has been said and suffered? Very few. The church of Jesus never was nor ever will be, disgraced by either rich or poor members, and let all the people say amen. As Jesus, through his godly life, became the anointed — Christ — so let all aim, by a life consecrated to God, to become anointed, until the whole body will be Christ, and every member a self-denying oneness with Christ and the Father." * * *

FAITH AND WORKS.

—o—

RICHARD FLETCHER.

Words are but signs; they cannot show
The fullness of the love we know,
By living for each other's good
When words with melody unite,
The gift of praise gives more delight;
And prayer brings more than earthly food.

A nobler song, than power of art,
God claims — an undivided heart —
Holding with sin an endless strife.
By deeds alone, can love be shown,
No other proof can be made known,
Of "Christ in us" the hope of life.

Too long the truth has been denied,
By talk, about ONE "crucified"
Upon a tree," our death to bear —
By which all sinners may receive
Free pardon, if they will believe —
No cross to bear, but crowns to wear.

Not Christ, an offering in our stead,
But "Christ in us" — the living bread —
This truth men lay aside to rust,
On worn-out words they try to thrive,
Pray God to "save their souls alive —"
Poor souls! all honey-combed with lust.

If mere repeating, "I believe,"
Could bring salvation, to relieve
The sting of unrepented sin;
Then might the farmer hope to gain
An hundred-fold of golden grain,
By sowing wild oats to the wind!

Christ comes to save mankind from sin;
Then how can those who live therein
Persuade themselves they are reformed?
Can vines untrained, wild and deformed,
Picture to us the newly born?
Does grafted fruit their lives adorn?

Since root and branch of earthly love,
Trail downwards from the life above,
Corroding mortals here with blight;
Great is the need — humanity should be Cut off from earthly loves, and free
To live for Christ, up in the higher life.

THE SHAKER.

Monthly—60 cents per annum.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

THE GREATEST HUMAN FOE.

—o—

WHEN Ann Lee laid the corner-stone of the Shaker Church, she asserted that the lust of the flesh was the root of all evil." Our subsequent efforts to keep Christian practice unspotted from the world, and above the mire of perverted human lives, attest her statement to be most righteous. Whatever controversy we have with the world, is mainly based on this issue. Humanity will renounce every thing else — riches, poverty, power and worldly honor — before it will yield for Christ, the pleasures of the lust of the flesh. We are charged with being narrow in our religious views; yet we know the need of our concentration, and cannot afford to leave this truth in obscurity, to enter upon any side issues of whatever name or nature. The gift of God most needed by the whole people to-day, is a positive, and working conviction, that those who engage in the lusts of the flesh, "shall not enter the kingdom of God." All Christianity turns on the base of an exceedingly pure life. Jesus, the Christ, never did nor could promise salvation nor heaven on any other principle, but "following him" in the excellence of his purity. All other promises, of subsequent teachers, are counterfeits, and will not pass the scrutiny of the Omniscient. Our hopes of humanity rest on the belief, that its members will be honestly bold enough to lay aside all subterfuges, and deal their whole violence to the lusts of the flesh — the giant devil of humanity — which will not down at the bidding of any, excepting those whose lives are rich in the identical self-denials of Christ. Striking thus boldly at the root of evil, all the future will be better and happier life; and those who will engage in the work of overcoming the lusts of the flesh, will never be justly chargeable with being circumscribed in their religious endeavors.

There are many truths being evolved for our acceptance at the present hour — of spirit philosophy and physical necessity — and while not discarding these, we cannot forget that our mission is the salvation of souls from the lusts of the flesh and mind; and that an "eternal vigilance is the price of such liberty." We will accept all there is of truth in materialization by the spirits; and the testimony that meets our needs of stricter physical hygiene; and from these, if possible, draw aids in demonstration of the great central fact, that the heavenly life discards all lusts of the flesh. There are millions who believe in Shaker heavens hereafter; who hope to be transferred thither by a process, which is an hallucination, knowing no self-denial against secret, giant evils. While we promise such the bitterest disappointments, we exhort all to seek rewards, that result from the purity of practical Christianity.

Brethren, the world is the better for our testimony; and although it feigns to doubt the possibility or probability of our cross-bearing lives, it pays us a silent, but just tribute, which is severely condemnatory of its own fleshly career. Let us continue. Let not the salt of our testimony lose its savor. We are truly aware of the immense gratitude that rises from honest hearts, who derive strength for their battles in fighting their monster evil. Let us preach and live courage for the world, by precept and example. And while the thoughtless sneer, and the grossly wicked ridicule, let us give assurance of the correctness of our faith, through the exceeding righteousness and purity of our lives; than which, no more powerful testimony can be delivered. Let the thoughtful be honest; let the preachers speak heaven's truth unbiased by man-made creeds; let physicians do their whole duty, and reformers strike deeply at humanity's greatest foe; and the lusts of the flesh will meet with a check — the world will quickly approach the millennium, and these triumphs will only be excelled by the precious beatitude: Most blessed are they who overcome the lusts of the flesh!

.... If you would bring up a child in the way he should go, occasionally skirmish along ahead of him and point out the road.

PAUL.

—o—

First Paper.

It is not a question in my mind, but an established fact, that the writings of Paul have done more harm than good. Still we have in Paul the curious anomaly of a man, whose life is far better than his theology. It is common with most people to let their faith precede their works; but, with Paul, his life is to be admired of all, as are also many of his epistles that are consonant with his life. But his "becoming all things to all men," gained none to his life nor to Christ, but gave ambush and defense to every theological stream with which the world has since been sorrowfully flooded. We admit Paul's unusual ability; we give credit to an exceeding humility, a consecration in his works with the people, and an overpowering mastery of other minds that made him the acknowledged head of the so-called Christian church. But it is useless to deny that Paul was a revolutionist among the disciples, "withstood them to the face," and charged them with hypocrisy (Gal. ii. 11, 14), and variously compromised the faith of the gospel first delivered to the apostles. That Paul aimed more at the building up of a populous church, rather than demanding that all should "follow" Jesus in the life of the New Creation, is apparent to all New Testament readers; and the consequent fulfillment of the "falling away" prophecy may be directly attributed to Paul, rather than to any and all others who professed Christ in early days.

It is a matter of exceeding moment, whether we are "following Christ," or being led by Paulism, into "by and forbidden paths," in the service of ourselves. If Paul wanted or wants applause, he gets it from those who do not "follow Christ" as he lived, but by those whom he permitted to live as Christ did not. I accuse Paul of being an apologist for the flesh, having an insane idea that he would "gain souls unto Christ" by and by; of permitting the practice of indulgences, which he knew, neither he nor others could practice any longer, and be Christians; and I arraign Paul most seriously, for the elaboration of Habakkuk's digest of Moses, 613 precepts — reduced by David to eleven, subsequently by Isaiah to six, later still by Micah to three, and then almost lost to humanity by Habakkuk — "The just shall live by faith," — an elaboration that frankly enjoins, among other things, faith without works." (See Galatians.) If Paulism would save humanity from their sins to-day, as does and will the life of Jesus, the Christ, I should have naught to say, and then would there have been thousands saved who will not know what salvation is, until they drop Paul, and follow Jesus. Strauss has labored earnestly in "The old Faith and the New," to harmonize the various and numerous sects; but "there is no peace" this side nor the other side of Christ's life. And when we conclude that the salvation of Christ is worth all and more than it costs, we will take Christ's life for our guide, and say to Paul, or any other apologist for the flesh or intervening human perversion, "Get thee behind me." As a Christian(?) after Paul's permissions, I could engage in "the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eyes, and the pride of life," and find apologies in his writings, as the immense majority of so-called Christians do; but as a genuine "follower" of Christ, I find my greatest opponent in Paul; and can see no hope of salvation for the world, until Christ's life shall take precedence of Paul's permissions. Of Paul's coup d'état among the apostles; we must leave to our next paper, asking a patient kindly hearing. *

THE CLARION.

WE have been plain in giving our testimony against any admixture of Church and State, because we know, therein is a wedge, which, in the hands of either protestants or catholics, would split any constitution, and reintroduce the Inquisition with increased horrors. We again sound the clarion of warning. Councils, secret and open, are being frequently held, the whole tone of which is inimical to the perpetuity of the rights of conscience. As we prize our religious freedom, let us say to the whole clerical force, "Hands off from the Constitution!" Let us enter protests against the presence of Bibles in the public schools, the opening of political bodies with prayer; against the name of God on any coin, and an eternal protest against the introduction of any religious term in the Constitution of the United States. "Render unto Cæsar" (the State), what belongs to him," "and unto God" (the Church), what is his — and this will maintain an eternal separation. Let the Nation be awake on this subject. Our State (N. Y.), in its last election, gave a most telling rebuke to a professional clergyman, anxiously aspiring to political preferment. First read this:

* * * The Hon. Felix R. Brunot, of Pittsburgh, president of the association, occupied the chair. Steps were taken to secure articles of incorporation, under the name of the National Reform Association. The maintenance of Sunday laws, the retention of the Bible in the common schools, the defense of the judicial oath and other Christian(?) features of the government, and the securing of suitable religious acknowledgments in all state constitutions, were expressly recognized as among the objects of the society.

Then find in the following, a feeling of relief that the pulse of the nation beats healthily as yet:

The State deals only with temporal affairs, and does not attempt to usurp spiritual functions. Therefore the objects and methods of public education are wholly secular, but by no means necessarily, or at all immoral or irreligious. On the contrary, they are decidedly favorable to piety and morality. But, composed denominationally as the American people is, the State ought not to impart religious education. The moment such an attempt should be made the community would be in conflict as to what form it should take. It may be conceded, without danger perhaps, that the State should not teach ethics, except so far as the great fundamental principle of morals and politics as to which all Americans are agreed are concerned. The religious education of childhood may and should be remitted to the family, the Sabbath-school, and the Church — the natural and divinely-appointed guardians of religion and ethics. — Zion's Herald.

* * * But the question is fairly up and will not go down at the bidding of the politicians. The American people are, as a whole, terribly in earnest in their devotion to their system of free secular schools for all the people; and they are justly and decidedly jealous of any and all priestly or ecclesiastical interference with them. — Christian Advocate.

Not as Protestants alone, but as American citizens, sincerely desiring the preservation of our institutions under the protection of an advancing intelligence, and with no regard to any sectarian ends, we are to day called upon to settle the vital question of the perpetuity of our free school system, and to "denounce as a crime against liberty and Republican institutions, any project for a sectarian division or perversion of the school fund of the State." Let it be done. — Baptist Weekly.

Let us all labor for the security of free thought, free speech, free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and equal rights and privileges for all men, irrespective of nationality, color or religion. Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar appropriated to them shall be applied to the support of any sectarian school. Resolve that neither state nor nation shall support institutions save those where every child in the land may get a common school education unmixed with atheistic, pagan or sectarian teachings. Leave matters of religion to the family altar. Keep Church and State forever separate. — U. S. Grant.

SECTARIAN FOLLY.

METHODIST Bishop Haven, having nominated President Grant for a third term (poor business for a bishop), the New York Tribune says:

Would it not be well for Bishop Haven to be a little more explicit? Else there may be danger of having Baptist and Presbyterian and Congregationalist, and nobody knows how many more sectarian candidates for President, which would be a very sad state of things; for when it comes to that, who knows but that the Roman Catholics may hold a convention and nominate the Pope? And then—great heavens! where are we?

BREAD.

CUSTOM and habits too frequently make havoc with health. While this assertion applies, with much propriety, to very many customs, we would ask attention to its bearing upon the use of bread, made of superfine flour. We say, "we like it"; but it is because our appetites are perverted, even the same as those who "like tobacco." We really mean, that we have learned to love its use, through the almost innumerable "ills that flesh is heir to" — becoming such an heir to the whole catalogue of headaches, costiveness, fevers, chronic diseases and sweeping calamities, more through the use of superfine flour than we wot of. We take the best wheat, hull it, and grind it as fine as we can; separating the hull and the coarser particles of the berry by a bolt, we get the fine flour. This we mix with water, and add thereto a mess of living putridity, knead it, bake it, eat it, are sick by it, and by the bye, die of it!

That which we should use as the "staff of life," we turn into a slow, but sure poison. With the bran we act with greater humanity, when feeding it to our horses and kine. We grind them oats, corn on the cob, and, knowing we should kill them if we bolted this flour, conscience and exchequer both forbid. We mind, and our stock is healthy from youth to old age. Let us reverse the rule, so far as feeding them the flour we eat, and soon the sleek animal becomes the poor beast, that in a few weeks cannot get up in its stable. Again, if sufficient constitution remains, feed it the bran we refuse, and it soon becomes the titan of yore. Who is there but knows that fine flour leads directly to costiveness, headache and other incipient ills? Who is there that will refuse to know that coarse-ground wheat bread, with the bran in, will not only relieve these but prevent them, and all those ills that supplement them? As presenting a truthful but unhappy experiment, let any one attempt living on superfine flour only, for a week or more — they will learn much by such experiment — of suffering. Again, let any try cracked wheat, graham pudding, or coarse-ground wheat in its various forms, for any length of time, and a happy experience will be theirs; not only through the expurgatorious of quondam diseases, but in the new life, of ruddy strength, and a corresponding health of spirit. If there is any thing that truly represents food and medicine, it is good bread — and good bread means something more, than material made of flour that has been killed by grinding, and poisoned by living animalculæ. The time is coming, and soon, when a person's religion may be estimated by the quality of bread which they eat. Let us reflect upon and move in the matter. And when we shall have less poor theology in the pulpit, and more genuine theology in the bread, it will be more than well. *

CONFESSION.

JAMES S. PRESCOTT.

IN the revival movement of Moody and Sankey, we hear but little said about confession of sin. Why is this? Can there be any thing lasting or radical in such revivals, without a thorough cleansing of the heart, by an honest confession? Will not those who build their hopes of heaven on such transient excitements be disappointed when they come to enter the spirit world and see the record of their lives?

Judging from past history, viz.: the days of "Pentecost," and the "Kentucky Revival," the angels of conviction are not yet sent forth, but they are coming — the way is preparing — and when they come we shall know it. Under a former dispensation, when one wanted to know what good thing he should do to inherit eternal life, the word was "Keep the law."

What law? If he wanted to be a good Jew, keep the law of Moses — physiological law; but if he wanted to be a good christian, the law of Christ, and then go on unto perfection. Water baptism is good as far as it goes to the cleansing of the body, but as the baptism of the spirit is to the soul, so is the baptism of water to the body, and it will take these elements combined, to regenerate the whole man and woman. "Verily I say unto you, except a man be born of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

To show the condition of souls when they enter into the "spirit world," who vainly imagine they are going right to Jesus, when they die, because they belong to some orthodox church, we make the following extracts of a communication from Margaret Bush, who died in England, many years ago, a Methodist; in answer to inquiries made by one Thomas Bush, who had been a Methodist preacher; and who was, at that time, a member of the Society at North Union:

"July 6, 1841.

"MY DEAR BROTHER:

"You wished to know where I am. I will tell you. I have lived among the children of God, about six years, and that is all. I hope you will never have to suffer as much as I have, before you enter into happiness. Perhaps you would like to know what caused my sufferings. It was my righteousness founded on selfishness. I thought I was very good. Yea, I thought there were not many so good as myself.

"Although I did not tell the people I was good, yet I thought within myself that I was; so you see it was not righteousness, but it was self-righteousness, and that you know will never stand the test. I built upon a sandy foundation. I thought that I should surely go to heaven when I left the world. Yea, I thought that the Saviour as I used to call him, would say unto me, 'Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'

"But ah! what a sad mistake. I found that I had all my sins to confess, every one of them, and this I was too proud to do. What, said I, after living in such a manner as I have, and being so highly esteemed among general mankind, now to become so mean, I thought, as to confess my sins, to relate them, just as I had committed them, I said I had confessed my sins!

"The question was asked me, how did you confess your sins? I answered and said, 'O Lord thou knowest I am a sinner. O merciful God wilt thou pardon all my sins. O heavenly Father, wilt thou save this poor wretched worm of the dust, from thy burning wrath?' Yea, this is the way in which I confessed my sins. I confessed that I was a sinner, and I thought it was all that could be required of me. I suffered, and suffered, until I was willing to confess every thought, word or action, that was not acceptable to God.

"I tell you, I had all to confess before three thousand faithful witnesses. Yea, I was thankful indeed for that privilege. I did confess my wicked deeds before them all, upon my bended knees. * * * Oh, my crown is not bright, and my robe is not white compared with those who have borne a faithful cross against the carnal mind; and this is the cry of every unfaithful soul. Now what I have written to you is truth, and nothing but the truth."

"ALL THINGS NEW."

—O—

OLIVER PRENTISS.

"No more death—no more pain, for the former things are passed away."

How? How is this little planet to be "replenished," without pain? How are our mortalities to be disposed of, without death?

Materialization and Dematerialization are the keys to unlock the deep mysteries of Holy Writ.

If dematerialized spirits can be rematerialized, for a short time, as from credible evidence doth fully appear, why not for a longer time?

If a materialized spirit can be dematerialized, for a brief period, why not as long as the Lord pleases.

Who objects? Not those, sure, whose part it is to perform the painful drudgery of reproducing the old way—the maternal drudgery.

Let us have the new way and make a clean thing of it—the New Earth and New Heavens, so long foretold—the ideal of all the truly great and good, since the world began.

Who knows but God put that ideal in their souls? Why not have the ideal actualized, as the heavens have graciously pleased to vouchsafe the ways and means?

RELIGION: WHAT IS IT?

—O—

* * * * The religious world must yet be taught to see, that if a man's religious experiences, belief, or observances do not make him better, his religion is utterly worthless, and he might just as well be destitute of any. In fact, in such a case, destitution would be an advantage: for we have met persons, of whom, on personal acquaintance, we were sure that the worst things in their disposition and impulses were those they had borrowed of their religion; that they would have been more amiable, just, and loving, had their better instincts and affections not been blunted and stifled by the bigotry or the superstition they had received with their religious education.

The necessity of being outspoken on this point is seen in the fact that the religious multitudes do not seem to be conscious of the wide chasm there is between the gospel they profess to follow and the doctrines and usages of any of the Christian churches. If we assume, even nominally, to be disciples of Jesus, there is no way but to study his ideas, principles, and methods: if we leave him to follow Moses, David, or Paul, so much do they differ from him that we are in sad danger of disregarding his words.

Yet Jesus is almost entirely forgotten and neglected in Christian teaching, that Moses, David, and Paul may be heard, and heard, too, on points on which they are least in sympathy with him. Of all the sermons preached in this country in the last twenty-five years, we venture the estimate that the words of Jesus have not furnished the text for more than one in five hundred; and when any of his words are used, they often consist of some disjointed phrase, that means nothing out of its place: as, for example, when the simple words "follow me," used by Jesus merely as an invitation to personal association while he lived, are "spiritualized" into some impossible meaning, and made to signify "conversion," or something else, of which he never dreamed. If Jesus were to reappear on earth, as has sometimes been suggested, it might be a question whether his indignation at the notions for which in Christian pulpits his name was made responsible, would not after all be less than his astonishment that this should be called a Christian land. He would find churches costly enough, and services of worship in preparing which no expense was spared; but that the only thing for which no provision was made, was that of making religious worship a power by which human life may be purified and human character ennobled. We do not expect that our religious observances will be of much practical use to us, until, at least, the conviction that such is their only true end shall be firmly lodged in the popular consciousness. This is now so far from being recognized, that the statement that religion is essentially GOODNESS, is sometimes mentioned with something like a sneer in our best religious journals.

It is time there should be a fair understanding on this point. Something of a conflict has recently sprung up as to the use of the name Christian. We care but little for names—qualities are fundamental. We see no objection to call goodness by the name of Christianity: but if Christianity in its essential elements be not goodness, that venerated name no longer has any charms for us.—The New Age.

GOLDEN SAYINGS.

—O—

.... Kind words are among the brightest flowers of earth; they help to convert the humblest home into a paradise.

.... It is said that President Lincoln once said to Senator Fessenden: "What is your religion?" "Not much to boast of, but I suppose I am as much a Unitarian as any thing." "Oh, a Unitarian," said Lincoln, "I thought you might be an Episcopalian. Seward is Episcopal, and I notice you swear about the same as he does."

.... Every true hero grows by patience. People who have always been prosperous are seldom the most worthy, and never in moral excellence the most strong. He who has not been compelled to suffer, has probably not begun to learn how to be magnanimous; as it is only by patience and fortitude that we can know what it is to overcome evils, or feel the pleasure of forgiving them.

.... After the death of Abdermen, calif of Cordova, the following paper was found in his own handwriting: "Fifty years have elapsed since I became calif. I have possessed riches, honors, pleasures, friends, in short every thing that man can desire in this world. I have reckoned up the days in which I could say that I was really happy, and they amount to fourteen." Oh, the consummate vanity of worldly fame and greatness!

... Education does not commence with the alphabet. It begins with a mother's look, with a father's nod of approbation, or his sign of reproof; with a sister's gentle pressure of the hand, or a brother's noble act of forbearance; with a handful of flowers in green and daisy meadows; with a bird's nest admired but not touched; with pleasant walks in shady lanes; and with thoughts directed, in sweet and kindly tones and words, to nature, to beauty, to acts of benevolence, to deeds of virtue, and to the source of all good—to God himself!—Blackwood.

.... It is a libel on the holy and useful sacrament of work to call anxiety by its name; for work, real, honest work, is of all influences the most quieting, the most serious and consoling, a genuine happiness in disguise. Thank God for daily work! it is daily blessing, for God reaches us good things with our own hands. There is dignity as well as necessity in labor. The angels know no higher joy than service; "the silent heavens have goings on, the stars have tasks;" and to the true worker, his labor is not altogether a question of profit and loss.—Albany Express.

.... Can true piety exist without honesty? We apprehend there are some persons who think it can, but if so they are mistaken. The consistent christian is a man of his word, a man of integrity, an upright man in all his business transactions. There may be honesty where there is no piety, but where there is piety there will be found honesty. Says Longfellow: "Morality without religion is only a kind of dead reckoning, an endeavor to find our place on a cloudy sea by measuring the distance we have to run, but without any observation of the heavenly bodies."

.... A dyspeptic minister gorging his system with the rich food prepared by the "sisters," and taking no exercise, is a spectacle to make only hildels and undertakers rejoice. It was gravely proposed to inscribe on the tombstone of a gluttonous young minister, who was cut off by disease induced in this way: "Died of going out to tea."—Science of Health.

PHILOSOPHICAL BRANCH.

.... Warts may be removed, says a celebrated physician, by rubbing them night and morning with a moistened piece of muriate of ammonia. They soften and dwindle away, leaving no such mark as follows their dispersion with lunar caustic.

.... Glue frequently cracks because of the dryness of the air in rooms warmed by stoves. An Austrian contemporary recommends the addition of a little chloride of calcium to glue to prevent this disagreeable property of cracking. Chloride of calcium is such a deliquescent salt that it attracts enough moisture to prevent the glue from cracking. Glue thus prepared will adhere to glass, metal, etc., and can be used for putting on labels without danger of their dropping off.

.... A Dane has invented an arrangement to take the place of crutches, by which the cripple can go fast or slow, and up or down stairs without touching his feet to the ground or working but one arm.

.... A cubic inch of gold is worth $146, a cubic foot $352,288. The quantity of gold now in existence is estimated to be $3,000,000,000, which, welded in one mass, could be contained in a cube of 23 feet.

.... Recent investigations with new apparatus, made by Professor Cornu, at Paris, show the velocity of light to be 300,400 kilometres or 186,660 miles per second. This was the mean of 508 observations.

.... The signal recently erected on the summit of Mt. Shasta, Cal., by the coast survey, is a hollow cylinder of galvanized iron, twelve feet high, and two and a half in diameter, surmounted by a cone of nickel-plated copper. The reflection from this cone is so strong that it is believed the signal can be used for observations at a distance of 100 miles.

.... A singular mathematical fact. Any number of figures you may wish to multiply by 5 will give the same result if divided by 2—a much quicker operation; but you must remember to annex a cipher to the answer, whenever there is no remainder, and when there is a remainder, whatever it may be, annex a 5 in the answer. Multiply 464 by 5, and the answer will be 2,320; dividing the same number by 2 and you will have 232, and as there is no remainder, add a cipher. Now take 357, and multiply by 5; there is 1,785. Divide the same number by 2, and you have 178 and a remainder; you therefore place a 5 at the end of the line, and the result is again 1,785.

.... Manufacture of paper. Of the 1,300,000,000 human beings inhabiting the globe, 360,000,000 have no paper nor writing material of any kind; 500,000,000 of the Mongolian race use a paper made from the stalks and leaves of plants; 10,000,000 use for graphic purposes tablets of wood; 130,000,000—the Persians, Hindoos, Armenians, and Syrians—have paper made from cotton, while the remaining 300,000,000 use the ordinary staple. The annual consumption by this latter number is estimated at 1,800,000,000 pounds, or an average of six pounds to the person, which has increased from two and a half pounds during the last fifty years. To produce this amount of paper 200,000,000 pounds of woolen rags, 800,000,000 pounds of cotton rags, beside great quantities of linen rags, straw, wood and other materials are yearly consumed. The paper is manufactured in 3,560 paper mills, employing 90,000 male and 180,000 female laborers. The proportionate amounts of the different kinds of paper are stated to be: Of writing paper, 300,000,000 pounds; of printing paper, 900,000,000 pounds; of wall paper, 400,000,000 pounds, and 200,000,000 pounds of cartoons, blotting-paper, &c.

.... Parisian police lanterns. Safety lamps of an original construction are used by the night policemen and watchmen of Paris. A small glass vial holds a piece of phosphorus as large as a pea, upon which is poured boiling olive oil sufficient to fill up about a third of the vial. The latter is then closely stopped by a cork. In use, the stopper is released for a moment, so as to permit the entrance of air to the phosphorus. The vacant inner space is thereupon lit up, diffusing a clear, and, of course, perfectly harmless light. When the light fades it may be revived by a fresh uncorking. A lamp so prepared will hold good for six months without renewal.—Journal of Chemistry.

.... Dr. Hooker, a London scientist, recently exhibited before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, a wonderful plant called Dionid. A fly was captured and put upon a leaf, which instantly closed, and on reopening, it was found that the fly was completely dissolved. A bit of beef was consumed in the same way. The leaf was then fed with cheese, which disagreed with it so much that it eventually killed it. "Dr. Hooker explained that the plant's action was precisely similar to that of the human stomach."

SPIRIT OF THE FARM.

.... It is said that corn loses one-fifth by drying, and wheat one-fourteenth. From this the estimate is made that it is more profitable for the farmer to sell unshelled corn in the fall at seventy-five cents, than at one dollar a bushel in the following summer, and that wheat at $1.25 in December, is equal to $1.50 in the succeeding June. In cases of potatoes, taking those that rot and are otherwise lost, together with the shrinkage, there is little doubt that between October and June, the loss to the owner who holds them is not less than thirty-three per cent.—New York Bulletin.

.... Earth worms. Those insignificant and unattractive creatures are of the greatest benefit to the fields which they inhabit, though many have supposed to the contrary. They are very humble but efficient servants of the agriculturist; and far from injuring his meadow and his garden, they devote themselves with praiseworthy assiduity to turning over the soil to a greater depth and more thoroughly than can be done with the best appliances known to science. These animals (for so they are classified by the naturalists) are scarcely more than animated tubes. They seem to live by taking earth and earthly substances in at one end and passing them out at the other. This simple process of digestion is aided, however, by a mucous secretion; and the worm has a habit, when he has filled himself with earth, of ascending to the surface, turning around and working himself back again into the ground. This operation unloads him; and the process repeated by millions of his fellows cannot but have a highly beneficial effect upon the quality of land. It is said by Mr. Darwin that these worms have been known to cover a field to the depth of thirteen inches in the course of eighty years. A slow process, to be sure, but so are all the processes of Nature. This, however, is not all that they do. They carry their shafts and galleries to a depth of several feet, and cross and intersect in all directions, loosening the soil, opening it to the air and water, and, in short, doing all that they can to help vegetation, without preying upon it or injuring its roots in the slightest degree.

.... Ten rules for farmers. 1. Take good papers, and read them. 2. Keep an account of farm operations. 3. Do not leave implements scattered over the farm, exposed to snow, rain, and heat. 4. Repair tools and buildings at a proper time, and do not suffer subsequently threefold expenditure of time and money. 5. Use money judiciously, and do not attend auction sales to purchase all kinds of trumpery because it is cheap. 6. See that fences are well repaired, and cattle not grazing in the meadows or grain fields or orchards. 7. Do not refuse to make correct experiments, in a small way, of many new things. 8. Plant fruit-trees well, care for them, and of course get good crops. 9. Practice economy by giving stock shelter during the winter; also good food, taking out all that is unsound, half rotten, or mouldy. 10. Do not keep tribes of cats and snarling dogs around the premises, which eat more in a month than they are worth in a life-time. Journal of Chemistry.

.... Oriental economy. England washes most of the manure made by her people into the ocean, and then hunts over the globe from Egypt to Peru for more to waste. The United States does no better. But the natives of Japan and China maintain the fertility of their soil by saving what those who pretend to be civilized throw away. They have no worn-out, abandoned fields.

.... Nine quarts of milk, on the average, are required to make a pound of butter.

.... Since 1860 the wool-clip of the United States has more than trebled; or doubled in less than ten years.

.... The fact that England is exporting humblebees to some of her eastern dominions, for the valuable purpose of fertilizing red clover, calls to our mind that in one of the earlier works of Darwin, this keen observer treated on the subject of cats and clover. In said work, he estimated the number of mice in the fields from the number of cats in the vicinity; and the number of bees by the number of mice nests remaining for the bees' households. He summed up thus: The more cats, the less mice; consequently the less humblebees; and with these wanting to fertilize the clover, the less clover. England, in transporting bees to New Zealand, is paying a grand tribute to the wisdom of Darwin.

THE POTATO.

We do not know what we could substitute for the potato. We are not anxious to have any thing replace it; for while our Peach-blows and Rose are greeted three times a day by untired appetites, they shall continue to be most welcome on our tables. We change the complexion and flavor of our bread for palato's sake; and the common white is made to give way to graham, biscuits, buns, cake and variously. Bread, in some form, is ever agreeable; but its form must change, to be as agreeable as it is. But the potato is never really better, than when coming to our tables in its simplest and original form, boiled, immediately after paring. The too common practice of paring potatoes, and leaving them to stand in water for hours, is wasteful and detrimental. The water that has surrounded pared potatoes for a given number of hours, contains more gluten, which goes to replenish the wasted tissue, than do the potatoes. The water is, of course, thrown away, while the potatoes, much less substantial than before, are placed on the table; and if they do not repair mortal waste only a little more than would saw-dust, the cause is plain. Leckey, the famous historian, opposes their extensive use by any people; ascribing the degeneracy of the Irish race to this cause. We are strongly inclined to dispute the testimony of this eminent authority; and to seek for the real cause of their degeneracy, in the direction of another very prominent excess of the Irish, where, perhaps, their exclusive potato diet is insufficient to repair their wasted human tissues. But we are confronted by too many scientists upon this question, to doubt that it has received abundant consideration. Quite a number of German savants have also been very disagreeably impressed by the potato from late analysis; considering its extensive use as weakening, both mentally and physically.

Carl Vogt speaks of it in very inferior terms. Mulder, the Dutch physiologist, attributes the indolence of nations to potatoes among the poor, and tea and coffee with the wealthy. And O. S. Fowler's only apparent recommendation of the potato seems to be that it fills up a vacuum that might or would be occupied by something worse. We are really sorry that this humble and abundant esculent should fare so unkindly at scientific hands. We are loth to look on the potato rot as a blessing in disguise; and we are quite unwilling to part with a long-tried, every-day friend, because it is discovered to be less valuable than some of its nobler relations. Nor are we persuaded that an exclusively potato diet is any more detrimental, nor as much so, as an exclusively meat diet; and the potato, being of coarser and milder material than meats, may have saved stronger nations than the Irish, from greater degeneracy and worse, by its being so usual an accompaniment of meats, excepting with the Indians, and they are barbarous, and as savage as the beasts which they eat. *

SEASON OF DEVOTION.

JAS. G. RUSSELL.

ENFIELD, N. H.

Blessed season of de-vot-ion, When the saints in love do meet, Boundless as the waves of ocean, Flows the spirit pure and sweet.
 Zion's children raise your voices, Freedom's glorious strain prolong, While the heavenly host re-joices, Echoing back the conqueror's song.

Angels from the realms of glory, Join our ranks in tune-ful praise, Bringing blessings pure and ho-ly From the heavenly Throne of Grace.
 Saints in darkness, bound no longer, Leave the shades of endless night, Never more in sin to wander, Join the chorus with de-light.

Bless the day, the happy hour,
 When the gospel trump was heard,
 Bringing forth that light and power,
 That would reach a dying World.
 Sin-sick souls the call obeying,
 Find deliverance from the fall;
 While the faithless, still delaying,
 Lose their precious day and call.

Shout again with deep emotion,
 Let the joyful accents roll,
 Blessed season of devotion,
 How refreshing to the soul.
 Heavenly guardians, now before us,
 Let your blessing crown the scene;
 While we make sweet praise our chorus,
 And salvation's prize our theme.

MUSIC NO. 2.

J. G. RUSSELL.

A CERTAIN eminent musician very aptly remarks, that "the voice may be regarded as a musical instrument, and at least, as much care should be taken to avoid injury to it, as is taken with other musical instruments." Under this consideration we resume the subject of music under the head of physiological voice-training. As vocal melody becomes impaired when carried beyond the proper limits of the voice, so likewise, the voice itself becomes impaired when carried beyond its proper limits; thus making a two-fold objection to this violation. But to arrive at conclusive evidence of the point at issue, we must carefully consider the origin of the voice, and every part that has to do in the production of musical tone. First, the Lungs—those great organs of the human body, whose active service is so indispensable to life and health,—how are they to be rendered fit for continued service, unless properly supplied with pure air, that all essential, vitalizing, and life-giving element? And yet, how often, and to what an alarming extent is this negligence carried by many of the would-be-proficient songsters of our day. An interesting incident of this neglect occurs to mind, and may not be out of place for record here. A short time since, as the writer was officiating as singing teacher, the choir was being exercised in that peculiar part of music drill, called breathing. The command was given for each singer to inflate the lungs, when an exasperated young songstress quaintly remarked that she would gladly do so, had she any thing to fill them with. This timely hint was not without its desired effect, for the doors were immediately thrown open, and the proper means of ventilation attended to, as far as consistent, and the command again given to inflate, was promptly obeyed, with satisfactory results. It is an observation of quite frequent occurrence that an ill-ventilated singing apartment will have such a serious effect on the choir, that with all the powers at command, the singers are utterly unable to sustain the key. But at such a crisis, the simple opening of a door or window will affect a wonderful change for the better. Elder Frederick W. Evans, one of our most worthy veterans in the great physiological reform movement, once suggested to the writer that "in every church, music hall, or wherever a mass of human bodies were assembled, there should be one or more individuals officiating in the ventilating department:—stepping into the crowded room every few minutes, and marking the exact condition there." If human life depends so much upon the invigorating draughts of pure air, why should not the above suggestion be regarded of as much necessity as that of a body of police at a camp meeting? With the rapid march of progress it is to be trusted that this fact will become acknowledged generally, and that our musical assemblies will soon be ornamented with the presence of a physiological police.

Again, surprising as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that many singers are very deficient in the practical art of breathing! Whether this defect is occasioned by the protracted habit of inhaling impure air, back, even, to the earliest days of infancy, or from some other personal defect best known to the individual, remains a problem to be solved. But the facts are apparent, that in breathing, but a very small amount of air is taken into the lungs in proportion to the amount which the lungs are capable of retaining. To prove this assertion would require no very extensive investigation into scientific physiology further than individuals are capable of experimenting for themselves. However, a few brief extracts from physiological authority may subserve the purpose of bringing the subject to clearer light: but this we will leave for the coming number.

HOW TO KEEP THE DEVIL OUT.

E. T. LEGGETT.

What famous plans by man unfurled,
 Each era brings about,
 Whose promise is to save the world,
 And keep the Devil out.
 How hope alternates with despair,
 As each new plan is tried,
 And with "Old Evil" waiting there,
 Its merits to decide.

Thus all our plans, like autumn leaves,
 Have fallen one by one,
 And Satan homage still receives,
 As when the world began:
 There's but one only plan that would Keep out this Son of Sin,
 'Tis fill the heart so full of good,
 The Devil can't get in.

HOME WORK.

—O—

THE following hymn was written by Garret K. Lawrence—the Shaker poet, physician and faithful brother—in 1835. It has been in constant song ever since. We commend it to general use, even if some may think "there's more truth than poetry" in it; for be it remembered, this has ever been the very just charge against all Shaker religion and life.—Ed.

This is the burden of my song—
Never to look abroad for wrong;
I find enough to do at home,
With all my best exertions;
Then why seek evil in another,
Or try to injure a dear brother?
Such are not children of our Mother,
But slaves to basest passions.

How easy for the carnal mind,
Evil in other souls to find;
While to their own, how very blind—
They're scarcely worth observing.
But when old nature don't confound us,
And we survey the saints around us,
We find the good, the just surround us;
Of heaven how deserving!

O, may I evermore be wise,
And make a right use of my eyes;
Not be a fool, and miss the prize
For lack of self-denial.
This search of self, if you believe me,
And my experience don't deceive me,
Is solemn work; then do not leave me,
But help me bear the trial.

Henceforth, be this my daily toil:
At home to cultivate the soil;
A faulting serpent shall not coil
Within my breast, I'll kill it!
This work will make me kind and clever
To all around me, yea, for ever;
Then love, and joy, and peace, will never
Forsake my soul, but fill it.

Now, in this resurrection morn,
We can't believe they're heaven-born
Who shun the rose, but pluck the thorn,
That they may torment others;
For here, in Zion's fragrant bowers,
Where heaven sends such lovely showers,
We seek the buds, the opening flowers—
Kind Sisters and kind Brothers.

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

—O—

ALONZO HOLLISTER.

"THE Law was a shadow of good things to come;" for though the substance to which the law pointed, existed, it could not come to man, until he was prepared, by growth, to comprehend it. So also the natural creation was formed to typify eternal things to which man was made heir, and destined to enter into possession, when sufficiently disciplined in temporal things, that he make no mistakes while dealing with eternal substances; and sufficiently unfolded to apprehend those substances, from the manifestation of figures representing them to his outward senses; as children learn from signs, called letters, to comprehend what is contained in books. The reflection of this eternal substance upon man's consciousness, causes some sagacious minds to the opinion, that there can be no such things as miracles, or special providences; because God operates by unchangeable laws. And so he does, where those laws are not violated; for, where all is perfect order, harmonious adaptation of means to ends, there is probably no need of specials. Laws are not self-operators, but principles through which intelligent agency is manifested. In the rudimental stage of signs, shadows, types and figures, the confusion caused by a wide departure from primitive law, man created needs that would not otherwise have existed; and these necessities increase in proportion to the extent of departure.

Accordingly as we near the eternal substance, by obedience to the law of eternal life, revealed in Christ, through whom the substance is manifested, the need of special providences is much diminished—in consequence of that uniform action, and adaptation of means to ends, which characterize all works of creation, over which the will of Infinite Wisdom exercises supreme control.

The intimate connection of the visible and invisible worlds, was first interrupted by man's fall from moral rectitude. God, in compassion for man's frailty, then promised, to all who would repent, a restoration of relationship to the higher order. That is, where the purpose of the natural order was so far accomplished, that the work designed to supersede it, would begin in those sufficiently unfolded to accept it. Though a large portion of mankind, presuming upon the goodness, and emboldened by the forbearance of God, continued adding sin to sin—and many hardened their hearts against all entreaty—despised the law of God, and trampled under foot his offers of mercy, yet there remained a resolute few, who chose to keep God's commandments, at whatever cost of selfish ease and carnal pleasure; and through these the restitution began, according to the promise of God. By them, the way of the tree of life has been held in trust for the race—in them, the kingdom of heaven, comprising the substance of all previous signs, types, and shadows, continues to be revealed; whereby a restitution of peace, order and union will be effected in all who will obey its laws, to the sacrifice of selfish life, and the things that pertain thereto. Without this sacrifice the works of death cannot be destroyed from the soul, nor the sting of death be taken away. But by this sacrifice, the soul is liberated from the power of temptation, and restored to union with its creator, from whom all good gifts flow, to perfect the soul in works of righteousness, which bring contentment and everlasting peace.

THE CHEMISTRY OF BREATHING.

—O—

D. FRAZER.

WHAT is the use of breathing? is it merely to draw in a portion of the atmosphere and then expel it?

Of all the processes involved in the manifestation of animal life, the act of breathing is the most important. We can live without food for days, but to live without air we cannot; we breathe about one thousand times an hour. If the process of breathing ceases but for a few minutes, life is at an end. Hence the necessity of breathing deeply of good air; just in proportion to our ability to absorb oxygen from the air, have we life. This absorption of oxygen by the venous blood is a chemical act. Therefore, to breathe rightly, first, have good air; second, let nothing enter the circulation which impairs the affinity of the blood for oxygen. Soda and saleratus should never be used in food, and the habit of taking much salt is amiss.

In former times when large open fire places were in use, and our houses loosely built, attention to ventilation was not required. Now that we live in close apartments with no open fire places, we are shut off from a true relation to the vitalizing oxygen of the air. Hence colds are frequent, and they are catching on the approach of cold weather.

Closely-confined air to breathe, associated with alkaline matter in our blood, cannot but be favorable to the formation of soft, flaccid, muscular tissue, just the pabulum in which the seeds of scrofula and consumption can grow apace. A word to the wise is sufficient.

GOD IN THE SOUL.

—O—

LOIS WENTWORTH.

THE world, with all its honors and riches, is nothing compared with God's favor. The reward felt by doing his will daily is all satisfying. Yielding the heart to God, nothing is lost, every thing gained—and the gain is an eternal one. The enjoyments of the perishable things of earth are cut short at the grave. The gains of earth are short-lived at longest. Its scenes and pursuits soon fail to affect us; and then, one unselfish thought or act is worth all years of selfish exertion. Our life has its trials—which seem hard to bear—these are important to prove us; for how will God prove us, unless we are tried? God requires the whole heart, a willing offering, a living sacrifice. Feeling that we have rendered these, a restfulness of soul ensues; and all passionate tumults, feeling the power of good in our souls, will, like the tossing waves of the sea of Galilee, obey the mandate, "Peace, be still!"

NECESSITY OF ORDER IN COMMUNE LIFE.

—O—
O. C. HAMPTON.

ORDER is a systematic arrangement of the different elements composing our practical life, including our physical, mental and spiritual existence. Although this is a restriction to the full meaning of the term, it applies with equal force to the entire phenomena of the universe. It is patent to all experience and observation, that without some systematic arrangement in the affairs of individual life, and a regular recurrence of the details thereof, very little good can be accomplished, and little enjoyment or contentment of mind secured. While man has not yet quite "worn out the make of heaven," and retains something of the genius of his original being, he spontaneously gravitates toward orderly arrangements in all the details of his life. He feels, moreover, a logical necessity for some kind of system, in all the departments of his existence as an individual, to secure the highest degree of satisfaction—enjoyment and peace—from his surroundings.

Much more does the necessity of order exist in a community of individuals; for here the problem of happiness and peace is very complicated, and the heterogeneous elements of its members, incline to run things into almost inextricable confusion. I do not conceive any necessary relations to exist between the two entities "Order and Government"—although in this rudimental sphere they are generally found in combination. I wish to be understood as dealing with order alone. In communities whose purpose is to be practical exponents of the social relations of human life, certain precepts and rules are agreed upon by the members, as canons of regulation, for the practical evolution of order and regularity throughout all the departments of such communities, and the very fact of the existence of these communities, implies that canons of regulation have been adopted by general consent of the members. And in so far as this is not the case, any disaffected persons happening to drift into such communities, are really not bona fide members, but schismatics, and should not be tolerated. I would be ashamed to repeat the hackneyed proposition, (rather truism), that no one should impose on a community, who is unwilling to comply with its constitution and by-laws, were it not my unhappy experience, to find that this is too constantly committed upon Shaker communities, and notoriously persisted in from year to year, with a perfidious perseverance only equalled by the false charity of any community, which allows itself to be weighed down by such undeserving material. It seems to me that no one in reason can fail to see the logical consistency of so correct a theory. In my opinion ninety-nine one-hundredths of all the afflictions of Believers, arise from the entertainment in our midst of persons at variance with the spirit and practice of our orderly, systematic arrangements; and who not only fail in finding satisfaction by their connection with us, but are clogs and curses in every department of society. And in the proportion that society fails to dispose of this class, it will gradually increase and overpower the conservative elements, and then farewell to Shakerism. It is fatal folly to shut our eyes against truths, or mince matters one atom; for natural laws and results never turn aside, to have any community which ignores the dictates of common sense—much less the wisdom of both experience and inspiration. Some of the reasons why we should keep good order, and hold rigidly to systematic arrangements in life are as follows: (1) In order to be happy we must avoid infringing upon the territory and rights of others; and good order will secure this desideratum when all other means will have failed. (2) We have too little time to do the much good we ought to do in this life; and a systematical ordering of our time and precious opportunities will enhance our facilities for benevolence, a hundred-fold. (3) Without regularity, periodicity, and permanence, in our domestic and public duties, the poetry of life, and that sublime constellation of spiritual and social amenities, termed the dignity of Christian Repose are quite impossible; but with good order these blessed amenities constantly recur, bringing us into rhythmic unison with that holy song of joy, which trembles through the universe forever. (4) That the bright rivers of blessing may flow from the infinite fountain, in the lines of least resistance; and these lines are the beautiful, geometrical lines of good order. These are the "streams that make glad the city of God, the holy place of the Most High."

THE TRUE CRITERION.

—O—
SARAH ANN NEAL.

SINCE the first dawn of the Christian era, many individuals, under the title of prophets, have arisen with apparently great, but shallow power, to declare the doctrines of some so-called, new life; their ideas of the only true road to heaven and happiness. Not satisfied with the simple, yet plain teachings of the Christ, they have endeavored to soothe their own minds into an unchristian belief, and by false theories of meaningless words, (better adapted to sustain the selfish proclivities of perverted dispositions,) have exercised their artificial powers, to wield an influence over the minds of general humanity, that would veil the genuine truth of the Christian gospel, from the undeveloped spiritual understanding. But, humanity in very many instances have failed to become convinced of the truth of these false theories. Nor is it to be wondered at; for fruits of spirit growth have not evolved from their teachings. And now in this age of reason, intelligence and advanced spiritual light, it is not even to be conjectured, that religious quacks are going to appease the restless, agitated minds of individuals with false and erroneous doctrines. But the results of so much false teaching, is, to-day, manifested by the infidels extant in the world; who failing to find in professional churches the truth their souls so much desire and need, become the infidels they are. The "spirit of the letter," even, is not there; hence no spiritual good is obtained. But, it is better to be unbelieving, than thoroughly imbued with error. The standard of truth as lived by Jesus, the Christ, is the true criterion by which we may know the relation we bear to the infinite spirit of goodness, by whose power we have our existence, and to whose acceptance we should daily live. Nor is the momentous truth of Christian testimony to be mistaken for the eloquence of artificial creeds, whose sounds greet the ear pleasantly, but affect the soul wrongly. The purity of Christian life and testimony is the line of demarcation, which separates those who embrace and fully practice its pure principles, from the natural, sensual order of the world, and the elements which constitute that order. And the work of the day, for those who would realize a salvation from sin, and a power to live above the practices thereof, is to learn and obey the truth, as taught and lived, by our Christian predecessors.

Keep this line of demarcation drawn, between the elements of good and evil, and the result will be a growth of soul, by the practice of heavenly principles, that will dispossess the human mind of every doubt it may entertain in regard to what truly is a religious life. Make the heart a pure temple for the indwelling of the holy spirit, then will our actions give expression to pure minds, and our words be mediums to convey to others chaste and holy thoughts.

THE GOSPEL, IN A NUTSHELL.

—O—
MATTHEW MESSNER.

JESUS was what the system he introduced made him—an illustration of the practical workings of Christianity. He differed from others, only as far as life-practice made him to differ. He was a model, for all who would be Christians—holding animal nature in subjection to spiritual life. He was a high hope to humanity—is now—as to what human nature can attain unto. With similar propensities; tempted in all points as we are; yet using the good power in him to defeat all selfish ends.

Jesus, being like other men, he was the proper person to be our exemplar; had he been born without a similar nature, he would not have been the needed, desired model. His gospel is an exemplification of dominion over every perverted and unspiritual appetite; giving hope and power, unto every soul, to accomplish salvation and redemption, by daily self-denial and the spiritual cross. His life was the result of compliance with the higher laws of his being—and by similar compliance to the same laws, every man and woman can, cheered by his example, "go and do likewise." If we want the salvation which was in Jesus, we must live as he lived; or we may want salvation from sin, time, and eternity without end, and never obtain it, except we "take up our crosses," and live his life.

DIET.

—O—

ELDER J. S. PRESCOTT calls our attention to an experiment in dieting, which a person in Medina, O., has practiced with increasingly beneficial effects. As an economical experiment it certainly is forcibly interesting. We condense: "For breakfast, five graham gems with butter; no inconvenience nor hunger followed—cost three cents. Dinner, $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. rice, one ounce each of sugar and butter—a good meal—cost five cents. Supper, $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. corn meal, $\frac{1}{2}$ pint milk, cost three cents. One day's cost 11 cents. For a change, one gill of beans which, by the quart, cost less than half a cent."

The correspondent claims to have worked hard, ate nothing between meals, is renewing his age and youthfulness, and only dreads the lonesomeness to be experienced by living to a very great age. ★

CHRISTIAN DUTY MEASURED BY KNOWLEDGE.

—O—

ELDER A. PERKINS.

In consideration of doctrines so palpable as those given by the immediate apostles in confirmation of the teachings of Jesus, in reference to real Christian life and character, that, with intelligent minds, there should exist such extreme ignorance, I am exceedingly puzzled.

Listen: 1st John 2: 16. "All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world." The spirit arising from these three branches, which constitute the world, is almost universally the ruling element in man — professor and profane. Paul tells the Galatians that "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting." Also, that "The flesh lusteth against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary, the one to the other. The works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revilings and such like." Can language be clearer and more to the point, showing the tree which bears such fruit? Such testimony, with the example of Jesus before us, together with a thorough knowledge of ourselves, gives unequivocal evidence of this fact — that in this world is to be found only a shadow of genuine Christianity.

The fruits of the tree we cultivate will crop out, no matter what the profession; our works follow us, declaring our condition; we are known by our fruits.

Verily, we see an extensive field open for labor; the marvel being that conviction seems so withdrawn from the earth; it is so limited in its operations, that with all that has been done to christianize man, so little manifestly exists, of real, genuine Christianity; that in man and in the fruit of his work, there is to be found such a destitution of the character and spirit of the gospel of Christ.

And while we would recognize the good we realize exists in the earth — while we would defend and preserve it, we should also feel bound to be severe upon error and in our condemnation of evil. Not because of custom or popular feeling should we uphold a wrong, bless it, or give it any other than its true and legitimate name; not because our fathers had not received a clear vision and perfect sight of science or religion, and thus through ignorance were in any degree led by false faith, should we shut out the light and continue to walk in darkness, allowing no growth, unfoldment or progression; but as patience will give a perfect work, so let wisdom render hers.

By promise indubitable, the earth is to be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and a highway is to be cast up, which will give souls a privilege to travel in and find an increase of righteousness, which will extend unto and beyond the confines of earth. Otherwise, why the mission of the Saviour to preach to the spirits in prison which were disobedient in the days of Noah! Jesus was commissioned to perform no foolish errand. In his mission, he evidently did a work of mercy, whose result gave not only knowledge to those ignorant transgressors, but power by which they could improve.

Progress is eternal: Tell us no more that it ends with earthly life. This is a contradiction of the declaration of the Saviour of the world, in that he was the only door of hope to lost humanity; a denial of the justice of God. No soul is deprived of mercy and cut off from God, without a knowledge of the revelation of this plan of salvation. There is no condemnation without disobedience to known light; the destiny of no man is fixed, so long as he is ignorant of truth; and equally inconsistent is the doctrine, that man is saved and reigns with Christ, without a knowledge of him and his requirements, and a baptism into his holy spirit. What then? The answer is clear; if man receives not the full revelation of his duty to God, to his fellow-man and to himself while in this world, (which is the ease with all who preceded the advent of the Saviour, and which is equally true of millions who have departed this life since that date), God in His justice will open the way for knowledge to those who are waiting in the spirit land, as were those who were ignorant, and on whom the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah.

ANOTHER HOUR IN THE DAY OF PROGRESS.

—O—

ELDER G. B. AVERY.

PURITY OF LIFE, not amalgamation of religious professions, nor union of professors who are antichristian in their life practice, is the panacea for the human race.

Realizing a want of power over sin, of ability to rise above the level of worldly elements, and their sorrowful life-experiences — a want of strength to sustain even the religious professions of nominal Christianity — the divided and subdivided sects of Christian professors are looking to amalgamation of creedal faiths — union of religious societies, and harmony of religious professors, in the belief that Jesus paid the whole debt of sufferings, for all the sins that believers in his name commit, as the catholicon for curing the physical, moral and spiritual ills of the human family. But the light of truth reveals this to be a most prominent error.

No combination or amalgamation of any number of impotent medical preparations is equal to the cure of disease, whether physical, moral or spiritual! Mankind are religiously diseased — a cancerous tumor of the imputed righteousness of Jesus is eating out their soul's life. A palsy, consisting of the belief that the animal blood of the man Jesus, shed upon the Calvary cross, is the atonement for all the sins of believers in Christ, is curdling the spiritual blood in the veins of nearly all souls in professional Christendom.

The lamentable fact is that all the popular religious creeds propose salvation, by the sufferings of Jesus, from the guilt, condemnation and powerful consequences of sin, instead of salvation from sin itself, by a personal cross against all sinful indulgences. This is a base plan of salvation, never conceived by the Divine Mind, nor taught by Jesus; and is instituted as an accommodation to a sin-loving race, who are still undesirous of being saved from its pleasures. It is a religious malpractice, engrafted on almost the entire tree of human development, and characterizes the physico-medical practice of our race, applicable to both body and soul, in all the lanes of life; prescribing remedies for, rather than preventives of disease. It is no less characteristic of the moral and religious therapeutics of the popular masses of so-called moral reformers, and Doctors of Divinity. Painkillers — in other words, nerve deathdealers, to benumb human sensibility; put the body to sleep; tune down the moral sense to the point of indifference, and bring the spiritual consciousness to a level so low, that no condemnation is felt for violations of spiritual law which result in death of soul, are the prescribed remedies for human ills!

The simple truth is, mankind do not want to be saved from sin, but in the indulgence of sin; they desire to enjoy its pleasures, but to be saved from the consequences. They crave the disposition that engenders disease, but to be saved from sickness; hence, the physician who teaches hygienic laws, for either body or soul — laws requiring self-denial, purity of thought, word and deed are distasteful to the majority. A religion embracing the power of salvation from sin, is, by the popular throng, as undesirable as a frost in June, because it cuts off the anticipated harvest of sinful pleasures. Thus the ship of human reform for health and happiness in body, mind or spirit, is embarrassed by blockades on all seas of life; and a work of redemption which might be accomplished in a twelve-month, by the adoption of Purity, — abstinence from the lusts of the flesh, from thoughts that blush with shame, indulgence in stimulants that fire the blood, in narcotics that benumb the senses is not wrought out in a thousand years.

The harmony of religious faith — the inspiration of heavenly baptisms that would flow from the honest confession and leaving off of sin in a week, are voluminously written about, oratorically talked of, and animatedly draped in song, as in the distant future, but are only known as in a dream of things yet to be. A religious life in its present, popular wake, is a golden fare!

Why should not the rising generation, as they really are, be stupid to its semblances; infidel to its arid professions; its mock salvation; its hollow holiness; its sinful saintliness; its indulgent sacrificial altar; its wholesale, silent, hypocritical confessional; and consequently unrepentant life, since these are but a mockery to the name of religion?

But, as our race has a religion embracing, 1st, Practical Purity of life — abstinence from all that defiles the senses and stupefies the soul; 2d, Consecration to God; 3d, Forgiveness and love to man, instead of war and strife; 4th, Living for the good of Brethren, Sisters, neighbors, and all humanity, instead of self alone — a universal Christian patriotism; 5th, A baptism of heavenly inspirations, ministering to the aspirations of soul-life; and all mankind will bow in spirit, acknowledging its truth, and be blessed by its benedictions of love and charity; the march of human redemption will be with vigorous, perpetual youth. Such a religion cannot be reproached, if not adopted by all. But a union of all denominations of professed Christendom into one brotherhood embracing the idea of salvation in sin and from its consequences, by the sacrifice of Jesus, would only more heavily curse the world; binding it with still stronger thongs of theological death; and leave mankind to the only sure hope of seeking a religion, gushing with heavenly baptisms of pentecostal power; the gift of salvation from sin, and a merciful and loving God.

A VISION.

HENRY T. CHILD, M. D.

"Behold I set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it."—Rev. 3, vii.

As I was musing upon this text I beheld a vision. I saw a great multitude of people going up a very steep hill, the paths were exceedingly rough and thorny, and sometimes great rocks were in the way which it seemed almost impossible to get over. There were all sorts of wild beasts in the road, among them I saw lizards and serpents of various kinds, and other slimy, creeping things. Many of the people had some of these animals traveling with them. Most persons seemed to be troubled and were glad to make companions of the animals, for they were nearer to them, and did not seem inclined to help one another, but generally they were taking advantage of each other. I saw women, who were wearied with their journey, and they sat down by the way-side, and as the men came along they did not take any notice of them, but would step on them and walk over them, not heeding in the least their cries. All along this road I could see open places in the form of crosses, and I heard a voice saying: "Behold I set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it."

I watched them closely, and after a time I saw one who was about to enter in, having become very weary of the journey of life. I stood near to him and there came two shining angels, who said unto him: "Thou must strip thyself of every thing, even thy garments, and go in without any covering, for behold there are robes of righteousness for all who enter." He began to strip himself, but there were some little things that he desired to take with him, and the angel said in a very firm, but kind voice: "No! thou must confess, and lay aside every thing, or thou canst not enter in." But he replied: "Oh I cannot do this." So he went on his way, hoping for a more convenient season, and these angels left him. Others came and said to him: "Foolish man that thou art, put on thy clothes and take thy treasures with thee for the road will soon be smoother." Then a little angel, pure and white, whispered in his ear: "See that thou do it not." And strength came to him for he had overcome temptation, and he said: "I will, by the help of God and holy angels, confess and strip off every thing and enter in." Then I saw him take off many things that had been concealed from my vision, and throw them away, and as he passed through the narrow door there was not a hairs' breadth of room for any thing but himself.

I watched many others who looked toward the opening, but they were going along with the animals. Some leading these, and others being led by them. I asked one of the spirits that was there if I might look in at one of these cross doors? He replied, "Yes," and I did so. There I saw a beautiful road, there were green pastures and still waters, but no wild and ferocious animals. The people were all helping each other along, and were very happy, singing songs of praise as they went along.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

THE GRAND SEAL OF CHRISTIAN HUMANITY.

WHEN the millennium shall have dawned — when "the fulfillment of the law" is established — when the SEAL, by which "men shall know the disciples" of Christ is ever apparent, then shall we realize that Love rules all creation.

The golden rule of Confucius, adopted and extended by Jesus, means more than it says. "All mine are thine — and thine are mine" — fall with crushing weight on the great sin of the world — unchristian selfishness. "Brotherly love" means something more than poesy — Christian fraternity, more than coöperative partnerships. To love others who love us is an easy matter; the drift of all humanity, good and bad alike, agreeably acknowledges this. To love those who please us — who do just as we direct — is an affection as noted in the devils, as in exalted saints. The comparative remark of Jesus: "Greater love than this, hath no man, that he lay down his life for his friend," is superlatively surpassed by love for those inimical — for those who do not love us. This love is something more than airy substance, which breaths nmake or make at pleasure — more than rhythmic poetry implies, and sterner prose in action, than found in paragraphs. Its name has been usurped by passion, and profaned to unholy uses through all time past, still its eternal principles are pure. The law of heaven is love; — in heaven on earth, no less than elsewhere. To know that God loves us, in our obedience and waywardness alike, every day's blessings bring us to quick conclusions. To know that we love one another, is knowledge unattained, and made impossible, by every exception we actually present, or mentally reserve. No sentiment is more prevalent in Shaker song than Love. It is well. Turn we often from the sentiment, to know that love lives not in song alone? Do we realize, as we should, that love has head and heart, hands and feet, voice and prayer, and unreserved consecration to every unselfish conclusion?

Do we think, that all barrenness of prayerful offerings — all failures in spiritual struggles — all "aching void," and want of life and zeal, of courage and confidence, have been and may be predicated upon "remembering thou has aught against thy brother," sister, friend or enemy? How truly the song:

"The wayward and erring most need our affection —

"Withhold not this boon." * * *

Again:

"If we love not each other as sister and brother,
"How can we love God?"

And again:

"My life I'll square, my habits change,
"Till love I am possessing."

And listen:

"Love, love, practical LOVE, that will appear in my words and my ways, —

"Love that will clothe me, and cause me to speak,
"Kind to the strong and wise to the weak!"

And how faithfully do we comply with:

"Not alone for those who love you, are you called to do good —

"Nor for those who seek your comfort, giving honor to your word —

"But bless ye those who curse you — for those who hate you pray,

"For if you only give, where much is given to you, why is reward expected?

"Or why the kingdom due? Love ye your enemies,

"Do good, to those who love you not!"

And yet, it is so common, the world over, to make "the weak bear their own burdens;" to fail the helping hand to rise; and oftener give the gibe and kick to those who've stumbled! "The milk of human kindness," and Christian affection, are too seldom seen expressing themselves in reclamation of the erring; while oftener the cold chill of unchristian indifference and sectarian slight replace them! How true it is, where one is found in error, loving souls can only magnify the gospel by helping the sufferer up! Whose value is enhanced, by any unchristian or ignominious action? Love, not only "worketh no ill," but worketh all, and every good.

Community Life, like every gift of God, is intended to circumvent selfishness. Brethren, Friends! We are blest with unusual facilities for the outworking of Christian love — as opposed to the me-and-mine principle of the common marital relation. Like every other gift, Communism may be equally perverted, to its selfish opposite — its accumulated force, and genuine aims, be made to contribute to the selfish area of me and those who best love me! but, as standing before high heaven, holding a sacred trust, let us acquit ourselves as men and women of God! If Communism fails, selfishness, and those who practice it, shall bear the responsibility.

BUT IT MUST NOT FAIL. Let those charged with the treasury of millennial hope, life, energy and human redemption, so unselfishly live that it may be well said: "Behold, how these Christians love one another!" and, as those "passing from death unto life," let us each work and pray with Abou Ben Adhem:

"I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves my fellow men!" *

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE RICH.

THE recent deaths of several millionaires—Singer, Astor, Rothschild and others—having quickened the pulse of the people, call into consideration the words of Jesus: "How hardly shall they who have riches enter the kingdom of God."

There is an unreasonable antagonism between the poor and rich, caused by the fact that they are so. The mere fact of one person being capable of accumulating millions, while another is not, is an insufficient cause for either self-exaltation or envy. But it is a fact that the great disparity in the ability of individuals to accumulate gold, occasions more inimical feelings, than an excessive ability to accumulate any thing else. The reason of this is patent to everybody—that the power which ever accompanies the accumulation of wealth, is so invariably used to promote excessive selfishness; and not for the ends of philanthropy. For the rich man to feel, that he is in no way responsible for the comfort of his poorer neighbors, is one of the most prominent of human mistakes. There is, no doubt, wealth enough in the world, to make all very comfortable. With those having superior ability to make fortunes, rests the responsibility of being "MY BROTHERS' KEEPER," to an extent equaling their excess of ability to get rich. But while this responsibility is accepted and exercised scarcely anywhere—(probably nowhere, with unreserved, unselfish consecration to philanthropy)—yet we find the best illustrations of this, in the introductory exercises of the early PENTECOSTAL CHURCH, and in COMMUNITIES, where individuals composing such, have solemnly promised God and each other, to devote their all—wealth, strength, time and talents—for the general good; and to fare and share alike, in all the comforts and misfortunes that may follow. And where this excellent system is honestly practiced, there is neither rich nor poor, master nor slave; neither aristocratic dominance nor servile mendicancy; but "we are brethren," is the happy, general feeling. Has the story of Dives and Lazarus no worthy application in our days? Tell us, you who can, wherein Wm. B. Astor differed from him called Dives, in olden times? Was he not grasping for gold, and most active in "laying up treasures on earth," until sickness and death seized him? While he rioted in uncounted millions, did the poor find in him a friend? Would the paltry sums bequeathed by his will, favorably compare with the value of a dime, which some men give to a passing beggar? Holding, the wherewithal to relieve the untold miseries of the thousands on every side of him, did he prove himself the value of a smile, a sunbeam, or a loaf of bread to a single household, other than his own? He died, forced to leave, what he would gladly have held through all eternity. What treasure has he now? "That is the question." With the simplest power to reason upon causes and their effects, who would have lived and died as did he? Instead of being an object of envy and enmity, does he not excite our pity? and his ill-gotten, useless pile of gold, and pyramid of selfish sordidity of character—are not these to be fled from, as from the devil? "It is easier for a camel to pass the 'Needle's Eye,' than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." Rev. Newman Hall, visiting Jerusalem, writes:

"At a certain hour of the night, the gates to the main entrances of the city are closed, and there is no ingress excepting through the 'Needle's Eye'—a gate so small and low, that men and women must stoop to pass it; and a camel to pass it, must be unloaded, and crawl through on his knees."

Here's Astor's chance of getting in, and those of like ilk. Rich men and women: Make your wealth an honor and a blessing,—study your eternal interests by devoting it "to charitable and religious (not sectarian) purposes;" and let it not bar your entrance to happiness in the eternal world. The subjoined paragraphs may, or may not have been delivered in propria persona, but they are true in principle, agreeably with our instructions. We copy from the Banner of Light:

"Gardner Brewer, a wealthy gentleman of Boston, recently deceased, reported himself as follows:

"I am strangely bound to the things I called my own, and if I have wings of aspiration, I cannot use them in consequence of this binding. I am absolutely dissatisfied with myself and every thing else, but suppose I shall outlive it, as people who seem to be good in this spirit-world tell me, but how soon God alone knows! I could wish that I had gone out of this life without owning so much as a foot of ground whereon to stand, but I cannot change matters now, so I must take the consequences. I called Boston my home. It was; but I cannot tell now whether I have one or not; but am assured by kind, benevolent spirits who are attendant upon me that I shall gain a better condition by coming here, and taking a new start." *

PEACE CONGRESS OF NATIONS.

As a war strategist, General Grant won golden opinions and the chief magistracy of the U. S. But, until a recent date, he was not even suspected of brilliancy as a statesman. Some of his recent utterances, however, touching Church and State matters, have, in the eyes of the nation, carried him to a front rank among statesmen; a large number of journals formerly opposing him—among others The N. Y. Tribune—complimenting him with delivering himself of wisdom, which the nation could not reasonably have expected for scores of years to come. The United States will not soon forget, the grand rallying cry of "LET US HAVE PEACE." In the light, and unprecedented glow, of the amicable settlement of The Alabama Claims, during the service of the present Presidential incumbent, we urge, hope and pray, for the establishment of a PEACE CONGRESS OF NATIONS, to arbitrate the cause of justice among all nations, with a view to banish from the world the curse of WAR; and consequently the expensive necessity of standing armies and navies. The time for the abolition of such old-time barbarisms seems fully ripe; and we urge the attention of our own, and all other nations, to a scheme, whose aim is the increased happiness and spirituality of all peoples. With WAR and its contingencies, as things of the past—with energies that have been perverted, turned into the proper, peaceful channels of agriculture, arts, sciences, literature and manufactures—none will say "I am poor"—for the reign of universal, peaceful brotherhood will be eternally established! This is not a utopian dream—it is possible—and we therefore raise the undying cry for a PEACE CONGRESS OF NATIONS, whose every diplomacy will aim to "LET US HAVE A LASTING PEACE":

"That golden age, on history's page, shall gleam in truthful lines;

For even now, its dawn appears, in bright, prophetic signs."

RUSKIN, TO THE RESCUE.

RUSKIN, the pen-painter of England, believes in the possibility of a heaven on earth; and is about to attempt one of the most gigantic schemes, to relieve his countrymen of the twin curses of pauperism and slavery. A large estate having been secured, it is believed, operations will begin in the early spring. Basing his enterprise on "the nobleness of human nature, the majesty of its faculties, the fullness of its mercies and the joy of its love," he enlists, under the Society of St. George, to make a practical reality, what has long been considered a utopian dream. Large estates are to be bought by the Society; on these villages are to be inaugurated, the land rented to as many individuals as it will comfortably maintain—the rents being reduced, as the land is improved. Every one must labor for his daily bread; where manual labor will do the work, no machinery will be permitted; in proportion as this rule proves a disadvantage, the rents will be reduced. The destruction of timber is prohibited; the tenants must not "deceive, kill, nor hunt any living creature, nor destroy any beautiful thing;" and must love their neighbors as themselves; and even where this appears impossible, "they must act as if they did!" In every village the population will be restricted, towns and cities being discouraged. Schools will be inaugurated, also museums and libraries. Stores will be established, which will be stocked primarily with food and clothing; subsequently with books and works of art. The dress will be regulated—"quite as much for the pride of the maid as the mistress, for the man as the master;" everybody must dress well; none will be allowed to wear the cast-off clothing of others, nor sell nor pawn their own to others. None will be permitted to appear in rags on the street. Health, peace, prosperity and plenty are to be aimed at, and every thing must bend to these desiderata. "I do very believe," says Ruskin, "perceive and admit in convinced sorrow, that I live in the midst of a nation of thieves and murderers; that everybody round me is trying to rob everybody else; and that not bravely and strongly, but in the most cowardly, and loathsome ways of lying trade!" To prevent these, and to establish every man and woman

"under their own vine and fig tree," it is his intention to turn the aid of millions of money; and let us all hope that his expectations may not prove a utopia. *

WE ARE NOT YET A FREE PEOPLE.

AN OPEN LETTER.

—O—
SHAKER VILLAGE, SHIRLEY, MASS., }
February 1, 1876. }

Honored Friend, G. T. ANGELL, Boston:

Allow me to thank you for your many labors of love. In so much as you have done good to any one, you have done it unto me.

A presentation of the facts from time to time in the future, which you have already brought before the public, showing, that crime is on the increase in this highly favored State, cannot but do good.

As citizens of this republic, we have several grave problems to solve in reference to its perpetuity. The effect of our system of finance, including usury, (one per cent is usury), on the creation of crime, requires serious attention. When the farmers as a body, invest elsewhere than in their farms, trouble is not far off.

The existence, and the rapid rise of so many millionaires in our midst, is anomalous with the logic of a republic; in the nature of things they are the offspring of wrong conditions, and are clothed with power not compatible with the general good. At their will, they can vitiate the sources of law and justice; and when it suits their interests, can change commercial values, and tax consumers, as the monarchs of the old world do their subjects.

The relation of the employer and the employed, increasingly presses itself on public notice. The late existence of slavery was only a labor question. The idea that moral agents, citizens of a republic, should be left by thousands, or even a single citizen, in the hands of millionaires, or companies of capitalists, the latter parties being in possession of the enormous productive energies of our times, and the former to do their will—glut the markets to repletion; and then suffer destitution from the very abundance they have created—thrown out of employment, on to the labor market as a commodity! is an astounding crime against the republic. That a moral agent, responsible to his own knowledge of right, to the Supreme Being, to his fellow citizens, and to all the demands of the republic, should be left to compete with iron, steam, and steel, in the hands of these parties, is atrocious—is the hugest crime of the nineteenth century. Just as sure as the labor question at the South was met, so surely will the labor question at the North, press to be adjusted. If not adjusted, then the great republic—the hope of humanity—will prove a failure; which I think cannot be.

Our brethren of the late slave States would not listen to words of wisdom. Their persistence in wrong culminated; then He, who governs the moral universe by law, as He does the material one, met them in their own paths, broke the yoke of bondage, and buried that form of human vassalage, beneath the dead bodies of the oppressor, and with the havoc of war, destroyed their ill-gotten property. Is there not a lesson here for us at the North? This ever-pressing and momentous subject, if not settled in wisdom, may be solved as was that of slave labor, in awful convulsions, dire calamities, and fearful destruction.

With me, it is a matter of deep concern, that the conditions of all the citizens of our loved republic, should be favorable to its perpetuity. Would it not be well for those who have statesmen's hearts, who feel the approaching future, to take steps in gentle ways and manners, and teach us how to secure a healthful distribution of all the products of labor, and thus avert impending evil?

Have we not one common Father? Why should not the blessings of civilization be as equally distributed as the rain which falls alike on all? Are not the accumulations of wealth the fruits of modern civilization? If so, is it morally wholesome that it should be left to accumulate at some points to fester into extravagance, and be withdrawn from others, causing want, discontent, degradation and crime? Would it not be well for every producer to have an interest in the fruit of his labor as has the employer, and so cease to be virtually a slave?

Is it ever taken into consideration, that the domestic surroundings of men of wealth to-day, exceed those of princes of the fifteenth century? while in this day, the surroundings of the poor are in many, very many cases destructive of health and life, and the means of living as limited nearly, and more uncertain than of that century? Again, the wealth alluded to, is the outcome of the intellectual labor, not of a class, but of society. Therefore, the enormously productive energies of mechanical and chemical appliances belong of right to all. They should be assistants, not competitors with moral agents as is now the case.

The ancients founded their republics under the light of other ideas than those of our day. The peculiar relation of families to one another, and the existence of a lower stratum of families in their societies, who had neither a hearth, altar nor priest; and of course, had no religious nor political position, necessarily caused great difficulties. When these occurred, there was no way to settle them but by overpowering the ruling families. Hence to maintain social equilibrium, from time to time, those who had amassed much land, were either killed, or driven off, and the land divided.

In the histories of these republics, when favorable aspects presented themselves, no doubt their profoundest thinkers favored a somewhat just distribution of the land—an approximation toward Jewish equality.

Land being the source of human sustenance, of social and judicial equality; and a regulator of the exchange, and values of commercial equivalents; to insure perpetuity to modern republics every citizen should be a landholder, or have access to land at all times.

To buy and sell, as we do a manufactured commodity, is to make those who cannot buy it, a commodity also; and is the veriest opposite of the idea of loving the neighbor as we do self. The Jewish idea was an approximation to Christianity—"the land could not be sold for ever;" only to the Jubilee. Under Christian ideas, land can neither be bought nor sold. To do so, is to make servants—slaves of our brethren. Kossuth remarked, "The Christian nation is not yet." Therefore we have troubles enough, and more, and worse in prospect. The earth is the Lord's, not man's.

The mission of this republic is justice to all; and is identical with Christian ideas and sentiments.

Were the sages of antiquity to appear now, would they not congratulate us, "that we were free from the demoralizing influences which bound them as with iron bands? With them, families with their gods and priests, were little worlds in themselves. Each family and its gods, were isolated from, if not antagonistic to, all other families and their gods; and in their wars sought the destruction of both. That now, we had the glorious opportunity to accept the human family as a unit, and to have no god but our Father who is in Heaven—who has given to all his children alike, the surface of this planet for their sustenance, as he has given the air we so freely breathe." And further, they could say, "That to lend upon interest, is to tax poverty; creates false conditions in society; is contrary to the feeling of benevolence, and to all the higher attributes of our being; and repellent of the injunction of Him whom we profess to pattern after—lend, hoping for nothing again."

Can it be said that the foregoing is impracticable? Did not the founders of this republic, through many sufferings, bequeath to us a social compact organically just? Having such magnificent opportunities, shall we fail to render it so? Nay, let us advance a step, be more than just—be beneficent; then it will be easy to be just. The time has indeed arrived for nations and individuals to manifest to each other a divine humanity—to breathe forth into practicability the inspiration of our loved neighbor Emerson:

"And each shall care for other,
And each to each shall bend,
To the poor a noble brother,
To the good an equal friend"

I have written from the midst of a Shaker Community. Your form of government is organically just. Ours, is organically divine. Carry out your ideas into practice, and permanence, peace, prosperity are yours. Carrying out ours, a stability, peace, and prosperity which has never been exceeded, is ours now.

Those who have an inward feeling—a craving to live the higher life—to realize in themselves, in their every day life, the inspiration of the poet we have quoted, may visit us. With sentiments of deep respect, I have the happiness to be your friend.

Daniel Fraser.

LOVE AND LOGIC.

—O—
F. W. EVANS.

God is said to be love. It may as truly be said, God is Logic. Love preceeds Logic, and logic that does not rest back upon Love, is powerless for good to man.

When Rarcy convinced a wild, strong horse, of man's superior power, he used that power in love, gaining the confidence and affection of the inferior animal.

Before all other emotions, is the emotion of love to a new-born being. Love is the cord that holds the offspring to discipline. Love is unselfish. When we affirm that natural affections are selfish, it is true only as compared with spiritual affections, which supplant and supersede the natural. Blood relation is selfish relation, and is the basis of natural affections—mine and thine.

Soul travail is from self to God. When called by the Gospel, souls are either in a normal, or abnormal condition. Jesus and His fellows, as natural men and women, were in a relatively normal condition when called by the Christ-Spirit. In reproduction, their parents observed generative law. In education, physiological and dietetic laws.

Aun Lee, and her fellows, as natural men and women, were Gentiles. As such, they were in unnatural abnormal conditions. Generative, physiological and property laws were unknown, and of course, unheeded by their parents. Their condition was prophetically foreseen and foretold ages before their existence. See 2d Timothy, 3d chapter: "In the last days perilous times shall come. Men will be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemous, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affections, true breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of selfish pleasures, more than lovers of God."

As Joannes and Jambres withstood Moses when he was the minister of a more spiritual order than that of Egyptian philosophy and religion, so do these Gentiles resist a far more spiritual truth than was ever revealed to Moses. How hardly shall such enter the Kingdom of Heaven, as those now established on the earth! Why? Because the first practical effect of Gospel Truth, upon them, is to convert them back to a normal condition in their affections as natural men and women—as John Baptist turned the heart's affections of parents back to their children, and the same of the children back to their parents—to recreate natural affections, the first form of Love in all the animal kingdom. Men, who had forsaken each other as husbands and wives for years, began to feel conviction, and think they had a duty to reunite with them in a true generative relation. Neglected children, and disobeyed parents, were sought unto.

Drawn away and enticed, by their lusts, they became without natural affections. Now they are drawn away and enticed, by those natural affections, to disobey the call of the Christ-Spirit, to come out and be separate from the whole, natural, generative order. Let all, that are called, press into the Kingdom and confer not with flesh and blood relations, nor with the affections created by the love appropriate to that order—but act as did the Apostle Paul—straightway obedient to the Heavenly vision—for where there is no Spiritual vision, the people perish, in and from, both the natural and Spiritual orders. If souls will confidently make the requisite sacrifices, to free them from the lusts and appetites of the natural order, they will have a just inheritance in the Zion of God upon earth, in which ruleth the higher form of Love, having in it less of self and more of God. Let Love and Logic rule.

The Sunday Press (Albany, N. Y.) says, THE SHAKER, while being full of good things, has two prominent faults—too small by one-half, and too seldom by the same measurement.

AGRICULTURAL.

—O—

"Now TRY IT," in the Country Gentleman—the best agricultural journal in this country—gives us the kernel of success with stock, when he writes the following article. We keep cows for their milk, and to get the largest quantity of this, no reasonable pains should be spared. *

COMFORT OF FARM STOCK.

THE idea of comfort, practically and intelligently regarded, is the key to success with all farm stock; other things equal, the most comfortable animal is the best looking and most profitable. Acting accordingly, some ten years ago, in December, I devoted a half day's work, $2, to tightening up a stable for five cows, so that no manure froze in it afterward, and instead of having less milk every cold snap and more every thaw, it was more right along, in milk, comfort in milking, cleaning the stable, health of cows and thrift of calves, and only less in amount of feed required. One small Ayrshire coming in just then didn't vary three pounds from 35 pounds of milk per day, and 10 pounds of butter per week, for five months. Publishing my experience in the New England Farmer, led others to go and do likewise, and some years after, one correspondent said, that one item was worth more to him than the cost of the paper—and so gave the ball another push, as all should do. I found that with a properly constructed stable, the animal heat from a cow will keep a space five times her size above freezing temperature, and still allow good ventilation about her head, regulated at pleasure by an adjustable door in front. The winter profits of dairies may be increased a third, in saving of caloric and food, and increased milk and calf product, by remembering that a kind man is kind to his beast, and that disregarding their comfort "costs money."

CRITICISM—APPLE GRAFTING, TRIMMING, ETC.

—O—

A. LEAVENS, AMATEUR NURSERYMAN, CONCORD, N. H., writes substantially as follows:

"Dear friend Briggs: Your article in JAN. SHAKER on 'Starting a Nursery' interested me much. Thinning the young trees, one-half as much as you suggested, is advisable. Root-grafting, is found by us to be as good as the chollar-grafting which you recommend, and its advantages are, you get several grafts from each seedling—using only a few inches of the root for a graft.

"Whip-grafting is generally employed; but any splice that makes a perfect joint of the inner barks, is just as well. Grafts should be set so that the upper bud will just touch the surface, to prevent the graft drying before cohering. I mulch with saw-dust as an additional protection.

"Elder Evans is mistaken about trimming trees in the fall—the majority of best pomologists prefer late spring, or June! The wound heals quickly, while trimming in the fall, the rot is more apt to set in. (How these doctors differ! Ed.)

"Again: Hen manure and ashes are inferior as top dressing for onions, to plaster and hen manure—the ashes tending to neutralization."

SIMPLE REMEDIES.

—O—

CROUP may be destroyed in a few minutes by grating a teaspoonful of alum, and mixing with double its quantity of sugar. Administer as soon as possible. All throat disorders find in this simple remedy a foe.

"A grateful reader of THE SHAKER since it was first published," in Grand Rapids, Mich., recommends a teaspoonful or more of dry wheat bran, three times a day, before meals, as a sovereign cure for dyspepsia, when other suggested agents have failed. There's philosophy in the suggestion, and undoubtedly relief.

A friend assures us that the destructive "onion worm" can be totally dispelled by a free use of common field plaster, as early as the plants will bear it, and continued. If this is so, every gardener in the country can afford to send the value of one row to the publisher of THE SHAKER.

HOARSENESS is relieved by using, thoroughly beaten, the white of an egg, with lemon juice and sugar. Take a teaspoonful occasionally.

CORNS: Pare closely; apply castor oil every night before retiring. The corn soon assumes the softness of other flesh. Southern Medical Record.

BUNIONS: Take juice of two lemons; put a dozen old pearl buttons into it, place all in a bottle; shake the material occasionally. Apply to the surface twice daily. This remedy is also recommended for corns and warts.

TOOTHACHE: The English Mechanic suggests to any one having sore or aching teeth, to put a piece of quicklime, as large as a walnut into a pint of water; rub the teeth and gums therewith once a day, rinsing the mouth afterward.

FELON: Common rock salt, dried, pulverized fine, mix an equal amount of spirits of turpentine. Apply on a rag, keeping the felon moist with this for 24 hours.

BURNS: One dram alun, pulverized; whites of two eggs, teaspoonful of lard or fresh butter. Cover the surface, change daily.

SPEAK NO ILL.

—O—

"Nay, speak no ill, a kindly word
Can never leave a sting behind;
And oh, to breathe each tale we've heard,
'Tis far beneath a noble mind.
Full oft, a better seed is sown
By choosing thus the better plan!
For if but little good is known,
Still let us speak the best we can.

"Give me the heart that fain would hide—
Would fain another's faults efface;
How can it profit human pride
To prove humanity but base?
Nay, let us reach a higher mood—
A nobler estimate of man—
Be earnest in the search for good,
And speak of all the best we can.

"Then speak no ill, but lenient be
To others' failings, as our own;
If you're the first a fault to see
Be not the first to make it known;
For life is but a passing day
No lip can tell how brief its span;
Then oh, the little time we stay
Let's speak of all the best we can."

KIND EDITOR: Will you please insert this poem in THE SHAKER? I think very much of it, and wish it a wider application.

Your sister,
SAMANTHA BOWIE.

APPRECIATION.

—O—

Dear Shaker and Dear Friends: Enclosed please find sixty cents for one year's subscription of "The Shaker," which I have read for several years, and which has been to me a source of great peace and comfort; so much so that it would be a great privation to do without it. Though my life has been one of many cares, and though difficulties have darkened my pathway, and cast gloomy shadows upon the bright prospects of my future; I have pressed on my way with faith, trusting to the guidance of that hand that can lead us safely, even through darkest clouds, and thickest mists.

"The Shaker" has been a light to my feet and a lamp to my pathway. It has brightened my hope and renewed my strength. May its light continue to shine, and its might prevail, till all clouds shall be driven away, the rough places made smooth, all wrongs righted, and all shall see the salvation and glory of God.

Looking forward to this glorious consummation, I ask to be remembered in your prayers, that I and many others may be strengthened and enabled to go forward in hope and happiness, even to the end.

With my best wishes that "The Shaker" may ever continue—doing for others what it has for me—teaching purity and peace on earth that all may enjoy rest and joy in heaven.

I remain, hopefully,

ZION'S WATCHWORD.

CHARLOTTE BYRDSALL.

NORTH, MT. LEBANON, N. Y.

Mezzo Piano.

When evening zephyrs whisper Of shadows of the night, When twilight nearer gathers And sheds her mellow light,
When morn upon us breaketh In brightness or in gloom, We find the toll of Zion Still in our hearts bath room,
It is a constant blessing From eve to morning light, A scene of holy union From morn to shades of night;
These hours well fraught with labor, Bring goodness rich and new, And this is Zion's stronghold, Her mission glad and true.

Then in this realm of beauty, We feel the magic spell That stills the world of action, And bids the day farewell,
And joyous in its mission, We hail each opening day, Go forth to meet the burdens That throng the pilgrim's way.
We store the fruits of conquest And day and night bring nearer It is religion's power, The ransom of the free.
For labor is the watchword That will redeem the earth, Her glory and her worth.

MUSIC, NUMBER THREE.

J. G. RUSSELL.

PHYSIOLOGISTS reveal to us the startling fact that the human lungs are composed, in part, of little air-cells, numbering nearly or quite six hundred millions;—all of which nature has designed to be kept thoroughly and constantly active, by the involuntary process of respiration. At this point a few short extracts from reliable authority will best convey the needful information intended by this article. "1st. The volume of air ordinarily present in the lungs is about twelve pints. 2nd. The volume of air received by the lungs at an ordinary inspiration is one pint. 3rd. The volume of air expelled from the lungs at an ordinary expiration is a little less than one pint." [Dr. Southwood Smith.] Again—"In health, the smallest number of respirations in a minute by an adult, is not less than fourteen, and they rarely exceed twenty-five. Eighteen may be considered an average number." [Cutter.] From the foregoing quotations, the evidence should be sufficiently clear, to prove that a far greater portion of air received into the lungs, is that which has been breathed over a number of times—as for instance—"a school-room thirty feet square and eight feet high contains 7,200 cubic feet of air. This room will seat sixty pupils, and allowing ten cubic feet of air to each pupil per minute, all the air in the room will be vitiated in twelve minutes." [Cutter.] And yet how frequent is this occurrence manifest, in many of our music halls, where music is the all-absorbing theme of the hour! The writer is here reminded of a somewhat pleasing interchange of musical ideas between a couple of members of a singing school. The interesting question arose whether the human voice was a wind instrument, musically, or a stringed one. The debate was not long continued, before both parties arrived at a permanent conclusion that the voice was a wind instrument, as otherwise it would have continued its sonorous effects, even when the atmospheric element was in a state of unendurable stagnation. Now, in the effort to remedy this prevailing evil of ill-ventilation, a two-fold barrier presents itself; for while we are striving to remove the vitiated air from our suffering lungs on the one hand, we become exposed to chilly, atmospheric currents on the other. A wide field is here open for architectural improvements in ventilation, which, it is hoped, will be thoroughly investigated, and active measures taken to remedy this physiological evil, throughout the entire length and breadth of our land. It does not seem essential to swell this article with scientific explanations or illustrations, to prove that which is known already—that pure atmospheric air is needful to produce pure and healthy blood. Suffice it to say that the culture of vocal music finds its ground work, as really in the proper development of the respiratory process, as music itself finds its ground work in the proper arrangement and modulation of tones.

TO EVERGREEN SHORES.

Ayer, Mass., Jan. 18, 1876, SARAH SARGENT, aged 86.
Shaker Village, N. H., Feb. 3, 1876, EMELINE KIMBALL, aged 65.

We were more than sorry to hear of this great loss to Canterbury. As a physician, nurse, and dear good Sister, "None knew her but to love her, None named her but to praise,"—She leaves us to bloom among the "Evergreens."

OUR DEAR J. M. PEEBLES.

A communication from this Christ Apostle, we are only sorry to say, came too late for this number; but like every thing from him, it is so good, it will keep until we next appear. Our April number will reach him in Yucatan, among the ruins of Central America, where, we have long been aware, these have had an attraction for him. Wherever he goes, he works for God; and let every heart lift an offering in his behalf. Here's an excerpt from his genial letter to us:

"How the days, months, years glide by! The Centennial is close upon us. And while our Civil Government is preparing for a grand opening in early summer, should it be forgotten by Believers that it is a hundred years that Ann Lee, the baptized of Christ—Ann Lee, guided by revelation—by vision—by Angel Hosts, landed in this country and established the Millennial Church of purity, peace and 'all things in common'? And should there be no mass gathering—no public recognition of this Centennial cycle by the body of Believers?"

SONG OF PRAISE.

JULIA JOHNSON.

While God inspires my heart to sing,
Or gives it life to heat,
Praise offerings I will freely bring
And lay them at his feet.
He feeds my soul with hope and faith,
And love which never dies;
And sheds on it a living warmth,
From his celestial skies.

His precious power my spirit fills—
My highest themes inspire;
His presence, all my being thrills
With ardent, pure desire.
His blessings, hourly, on me pour
His chastening and his love;
And mercies rich—an endless store—
From his white throne above.

His fires are kindled in my heart,
Extinguished ne'er to be,
Till I from sin and death depart,
All stainless, pure and free.
I'll do his bidding evermore—
While life and strength are given—
That I may find when time is o'er
A rest with him in heaven.

... Mr. Ruskin at present is advocating dancing as a part of religious education, and thus assails young lady Sunday School teachers: "At present," he says, "you keep the dancing to yourselves, and graciously teach your scholars the catechism. Suppose you were to try for a little while learning the catechism yourselves and teach them to dance."—Albany Express.

... The Chinese are evidently pagans. They celebrate all their holidays by paying their debts, forgiving their enemies and shaking hands all around. The civilized people who have gone to China have not yet induced them to relinquish these odd and barbarous habits.

... The perfume of a thousand roses soon dies, but the pain caused by one of their thorns remains long after. A saddened remembrance in the midst of mirth is like that thorn among the roses.

NOTICE.

We would very kindly request of our subscribers and agents, in sending names to THE SHAKER, that each name be written plainly and spelled correctly; also that the county, in which the subscriber's Post Office is located, be, in every instance, designated. Careful attention to these directions will avoid much complaint for non-delivery of papers.—Pub.

... The "Shaker," for February, which is now out, is a credit to Elder Lomas, the editor, and also to the house which publishes it, for its make-up and general typographical appearance are admirable.—Express.

EARTHLY AMBITION.

—O—
E. T. LEGGETT.

Does fate or necromancy reign
O'er all this world of ours,
That pleasure only ends in pain,
Hope's brightest stars go down again,
And thorns are mixed with flowers?

See man each ghostly mine explore,
Or breast Old Ocean's wave;
Here fighting for the shining ore,
And there to crown his golden store
With glory or the grave.

Yet when he's worn each glittering prize,
And laurels wreath his brow,
Is heaven beaming from his eyes?
Does joy light up his sunset skies?
Is hope fruition now?

Not passion holds him as her own;
Sin has her empire there;
His heart a desert wild has grown;
Of hope bereft, his pride alone,
Now battles with despair.

His childhood thoughts, his dreams of yore,
When heaven was on his brow;
His mother's voice now heard no more,
Save echoing from the shadowy shore;
As ghosts but haunt him now.

He knows no God but glittering gold,
And worships at its throne;
For this his faith, his hopes are sold—
For this, in death, he's growing old—
Who lived for earth alone.

WORK.

—O—
H. C. BLINN.

"WORK while the day lasts," may have a deeper signification, even, than many of the casual readers of the New Testament have ever imagined. Jesus seemed to realize the force of this expression as the active and earnest order of his life so fully demonstrates. Released from the ordeal of the wilderness, the Kingdom of God becomes his all absorbing theme. Exhortations, lamentations, and the publishing of the glad tidings verified his word, that he must be about his Father's business.

With this example before us, what should be the duty of his followers? Are they justified in taking less interest in the promulgation of the principles of peace,—in the disseminating of truth, and in the establishing of charity and love among men?

"Work while the day lasts!" comes home as an imperative command. There can be no deferring till the tomorrow that which should be done to-day. Waiting and watching may do for those who are looking into the great future, for an advent which we believe is already consummated, but for those who denominate themselves the children of the resurrection, it looks very much like hiding their gospel light under a bushel.

"Put your hands to work and your heart to God"* has a corresponding echo. It has no form of guess work, nor even a shade of future tense. It is a swift testimony against idleness—either temporal or spiritual. The disciples of that order, which is a sharp sword against every iniquitous work, must harmonize the spiritual interest with that of the temporal. A circumspect walk, before God and man, is as essential as is the food we eat, or the garments we wear.

While there are so many errors in life to correct, and so much light and intelligence for us to study, we certainly have need to work with diligence and care. To wait for God's time is a plea of the easy-going Christian, and to stand idly by from day to day, and from year to year, illy comports with the word: "Thou shalt love the Lord with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might." His time is the ever present, and as faithful servants, why should we not be actively engaged in the Master's service?

He who compares the development of man's mind to the growth of fruits and vegetables, must have a very earthly conception of the workings of the spirit. "Say not," said Jesus, "there are yet four months, and then cometh harvest." Better by far, accept the teachings of the Revelator: "Thrust in thy sickle and reap, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth, for her grapes are fully ripe."

If, however, we have neglected to become as the Angels of God, and have no sickles (testimony of gospel truth), provided, we shall become but indifferent workers in the field. In this age of reason, as well as of faith, we must not walk blindfolded. Would it not be a singular arrangement for the servants to congregate in some pleasant place to eat, drink and make merry, and say to the good Master: "We are waiting for and trusting in thee. Gather to thyself the fruits of the earth, as seemeth best, and we will patiently wait thy arrival!" St. Paul may have met with persons of this frame of mind, when he said: "Put on the whole armor of God," and work while your day lasts. No person understood better than did the apostle, the preparatory work and the spirit against which the disciples were to contend. Take to you, said he, the breast-plate of righteousness; have your feet shod with the preparation of gospel peace, and then take the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God.

While we stand as witnesses of the prostration and even death of many religious bodies which have arisen, and from time to time contended against the elements of the world, should we not take warning from these, lest we, thinking we are on the highway to the Kingdom of God, find ourselves, as did the servant at the feast, unprepared to meet the Master?

THE GAIN OF VIRTUE.

—O—
F. H. BRADY, Ohio.

ANY one having practically learned the true character of virtue, reflects the same on the minds of his associates. As the brilliant rays of the sun are reflected by the glistening particles of snow, so does the influence of virtue shine on the hearts of truthseekers, and unveils the mist that hovers over the brink of death. The most prominent characteristics of virtue, are godly knowledge and purity. Mankind, commonly ignorant of the sustaining power of chastity, are, unknowingly, sinking deeper in the abyss of degradation. It is true, that virtue is an essential element in the progress of divine truth; however unable men may be to explain the wide difference between its theory and practice. But the perfected religionist requires both the knowledge and power of virtue, to rise above the level of common humanity, help others up, and hold complete government over the passions. We look upon the inimitable foliage, cast in the crucible of virtuous nature. If we cultivate in opposition to nature, that soon becomes imperfect. So, by failure to use the power of virtue, men become akin to the satanic. Virtue is a characteristic of truth; and meekness and patience under trials are evidently the fruits that proceed from truth.

Crossbearing is necessary for the maintenance of purity. Under the power proceeding from the testimony of Shakerism, which is in opposition to every unchaste practice, we find an ability to learn and practice an exceeding virtue. And souls are rising up in demonstration of this fact, and are living evidences, that the knowledge and power of virtue, once lost, can be gained, and more than gained.

PROGRESS.

—O—
RUTH WEBSTER.

PROGRESSION is a law of the Universe, of which we are a part, and are subject to the same law. It is written, "first, that which is natural, afterward, that which is spiritual;" and we add, intellectual also.

In order to understand how far Believers have progressed, let us go back a hundred years, to the time when the Gospel testimony was first opened in America, and contrast the past with the present. At that time the best that our fathers and mothers could do was to work for their support, where they could find honorable employment, until they could procure homes for themselves, which they soon did by great exertion and toil, by enduring much hardship and many privations.

Some of the pioneers in the work have informed us that they had little room, and many had to couch on the floor, for a season, without a pillow; and they were under the necessity of subsisting upon a scanty allowance of food, so that they resembled skeletons more than robust working men and women. Should those of this generation, who are surrounded with many blessings in a spiritual point of view, and with all the temporal supplies and comforts that we can appreciate and use to profit, ever be tempted to murmur and complain, would it not be well to recall to mind the sufferings of Mother Ann, and her co-laborers and faithful followers?

A century ago all implements of husbandry were constructed upon the most simple plan. And as far as the feminine department of labor was concerned, labor-saving machines were unknown. Sewing, knitting, spinning and weaving, all had to be done by hand. Periodicals, newspapers and public libraries were few, and not accessible to common people; and indeed, in that day, those who earned their own living by honest toil, found very little time for reading and intellectual culture. As far as book-learning represents knowledge, they would in the nineteenth century be called illiterate; but were they an ignorant people practically considered? They possessed the knowledge requisite to adapt the means to the ends to be accomplished; and we should rejoice in spirit if we could say the same in regard to the present and rising generations.

We can but faintly depict the deprivation and embarrassment which the first founders of our institution passed through. Now, stately mansions, furnished with every necessary convenience, have taken the places of log-cabins; and work-shops and barns are well supplied with labor-saving machines, and improved implements to facilitate and lessen the work of the tillers of the soil. The then wilderness places have now become cultivated fields and well watered gardens.

All this has been accomplished by the blessing of God under the leadership of a woman. "When the righteous bear rule," whether the ruler be man or woman, "the people rejoice." Wisdom is justified of her children.

We now look admiringly upon the great change that has been wrought by devoted souls and willing hands. Early and late they toiled for other's weal; they worked and did not faint, and through faith in God they renewed their strength and ran in the path of duty as it opened before them, and did not grow weary.

In those days we heard very little of individual sovereignty or rights; but all true-hearted Believers were intent upon filling their sphere of duty, and idleness was abhorrent to their feelings. In this, brethren and sisters were a unit. As the first founder of the Second Christian Church, or Shaker Order, was a woman, and their strong faith in the duality of Deity was so well grounded there was little trouble experienced in regard to the sisterhood finding their proper sphere of action, and having unrestrained freedom to move therein.

Great changes have been wrought in the public mind in regard to woman's powers and capabilities since that time; and according to the signs of the times, as we read and understand them, this peculiar evolving period in which we live will effect marked radical changes in regard to woman, until she will be, politically, morally and religiously free as man is free.

The laws of progress are never idle—always at work—on and on is the watchword. Self-culture, individual improvement is loudly called for by the spirit of reform to-day. Through public schools the masses have the means of education placed within their reach; and the ever-busy press of our land is scattering books, newspapers and periodicals, both secular and theological, far and wide, and they are accessible to all, opening a wide channel for thought, intellectual growth and culture.

Notwithstanding the present facilities for education and mental improvement are far greater than in the past, we are not certain that the present generation will fulfill its destiny, and acquit itself better and more in accordance with the demands of the age, than did the past. However that may be we can join with the poet, who said, "Honor and fame from no condition rise, act well your part; there all the honor lies."

If we behold a beautiful tree covered with foliage, and radiant with blossoms, or laden with fruit, we would not condemn the root because it is less comely; were it not for the root the tree had not existed. Every thing in its place, time and season. "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear."

Those who preceded us did the work of their day faithfully; we honor them and cherish their memory, and revere them as our gospel parents. They paved the way through deprivation and suffering for us to walk in, and left a godly example—way-marks for us to observe as a guide while on our homeward march. May we follow them as they followed Christ, and perform the duties of our day as fully as they performed theirs; and so fear God that we may make a right use of knowledge, and thus be perfected in wisdom, in my prayer.

TIME, AND ITS WORK ON THE SOUL.

—O—
WILLIAM DAVIDSON.

Do we notice how much more rapidly each succeeding year seems to pass away? Can we not remember how in our childhood the term of a year appeared boundless, and that we could compress into that great space of time almost any amount of work and play?

But, that as we grow older how is it with all our industry? Time seems too short for the work we take in hand; we become so engrossed, that sabbaths and holidays are alike invaded; and after all is done, how much we leave unfinished, how many schemes remain untried! It is a solemn thought connected with life, that its last business is begun in earnest, when midway between the cradle and the grave; and man begins to marvel that the days of youth are gone, only half enjoyed. When the first gray hairs become visible—when the unwelcome truth fastens itself upon the mind, that a man is no longer going up hill, but down—he looks back on things behind, as the dreams of other days. As we review the disappointed hopes, and our short comings, the heart grows weary of the struggle, and we begin to realize our insignificance.

Those who have climbed to the pinnacle of fame, or revelled in luxury and wealth, go to the grave at last, with the poor mendicant—that begs by the wayside, and like him, are soon forgotten.

But what does a man take with him when he launches into that which is beyond the grave? It appears that he takes nothing. Death seems to pass a sponge over all that has gone before. It seems a total breaking off, from all that life has hitherto consisted. But if we look truly, past life is just the one thing that a man takes with him when he dies; and that self is the product of all his past experiences and actions. When he stands at the end of life he is what he has been made by all his actions, joys and sufferings; these he takes into the other world—in his own character. The life to come, and the life that now is, are parts of one life—they are related, just as youth and manhood are related. The man is not the same that was the boy; but the boy entered into the man, as a part of him. The strength I gain by victories this year, and the weaknesses into which I come by defeats, will be a part of me next year. So that there is not an act, a word, or thought, but casts its influence into the tomorrow, which lies beyond the grave. According to what man attains in this stage of life, so is his beginning in the next—so must he commence there according as he has finished here—on a high plane or a low one. To love God, to trust in him, and to obey him, to be pure, upright and loving, is a good preparation for death, and is true life.

Every man has his own work to do—his own battle to fight—to overcome the flesh, subject the animal, to the spiritual; even through many struggles. Each has his own field to conquer, or to be conquered in; and every hour has its skirmish. Nor has any one a single line of effort only. We are tried on this side, and on that. Now in temper, now in faith, now in the solitude of our hearts, and now by those around us.

Not one of these experiences but leaves its mark, according as we are true or false to the opportunity. And by the summing up of all these, character is formed through these many daily acts; and this abides with us, when we face death, and cross the boundary line.

ADDRESS OF ANTOINETTE DOOLITTLE.

—O—
Before Peace Society, New York, February 21, 1876.

Over the door through which we passed this evening I saw the words written, "Hitherto, God hath helped us." The inspirational power that has attended our sister (Phebe A. Hanford) who has addressed us, is evidence that He will continue to help us, if we will help ourselves. The subject of "Universal Peace" brought to our attention is a theme worthy of profound consideration.

Jesus said, "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." What was the world of which Jesus spake, and which one of the apostles said, "If any man love, the love of the Father is not in him?" According to Scripture, "The lusts of the flesh and mind, and the pride of life," constitute that world, from which the followers of Jesus are exhorted to be separate, and to keep themselves unspotted.

It would appear that human society as it exists to-day—in its domestic relations, political factions and national councils—resembles physical bodies. As the life-fluid finds its way through the capillary vessels in human bodies, and passes into the veins, thence into the larger arteries, keeping the machinery in motion, so the spirit of the world permeates and runs through every department of life, passing into broader, deeper channels, culminating in war, monopoly and slavery.

True religion is not bounded by creeds; it is non-sectarian. God is not a respecter of persons, but of character. "In every nation, they who fear God and work righteousness"—according to their highest light—"are accepted of Him." And all who live above the spirit of revenge, intemperance and war, and exert an influence to help others to do the same, are fraternally one, and may clasp hands over all creeds and dogmas which serve to bind the conscience and to shut out the sunlight of truth and divine revelation.

The ages that have come and gone have left enough of their history to show that Truth has ever been maintained through suffering; that bigotry, superstition, love of pleasure and self-indulgence have stood in the way, sword in hand, to do battle against its promulgators all through the centuries that are past. True, there has been a highway cast up for the prophets, witnesses of truth, to walk in; for at no time has the earth been so darkened that God has left it without a witness of Himself. Often-times those witnesses, like lone travelers in a waste wilderness, clad in garments of mourning, with sandals on their feet, walked more by faith than by sight, over rocks and unbeaten paths, surrounded apparently with beasts of prey, who stood ready to devour them. The lamps which they carried could only burn dimly, but they were firm in their integrity. Hope gave their weary spirits rest, and invisible friends bound up their lacerated and bleeding hearts when they were persecuted and bereft of human sympathy.

The prophetic period to which the seeds of olden time pointed, when "Righteousness would be established and truth in majesty ride prosperously, bearing the right sceptre," must have appeared to them far in the distance. But time rolled on, and even now how changed the conditions! Then, there were a few scattered witnesses, seeking to evade the rage of their persecutors by fleeing to the caves of the earth for safety. Now, truth has so far gained the ascendancy over error that it finds its way through the deep waters, the mountain ranges and wilderness places, and its defenders and standard-bearers have become numerous. Under the laws of progress, natural and spiritual science have been developed and accelerated. New channels of thought have opened, and new modes of transit have been devised; and pedestrianism is now superseded by swiftly-running cars, bearing the lovers of human progress to their proper fields of labor in every land and clime. Thus is the promise, in part, fulfilled. Righteousness is so far established that its ministers may fearlessly bear their testimony, and truth, in triumph, ride prosperously through the land.

Mortals are weak when depending upon their own strength, but strong when trusting in God, and coöperating with divine agencies to better their own conditions and to elevate humanity. We can do nothing effectually against that which is true. We may oppose, and place obstacles in the way of its growth and increase; but, apparently crushed to earth, it will rise again with new life and resurrected strength.

It is interesting to witness the balancing powers—good and evil—at work in our own time. Spiritual forces, in higher spheres of spirit life, are evidently operating to put an end to sin, and to roll back the elements of sensuality, intemperance and war in the earth; while the dwellers in the lower spheres of the invisible world are stimulating evil passions of leading men and women, making themselves abettors of crime by adding fuel to demoniac fires already kindled, and with their foul breath are fanning the flames.

Sensuality, arrayed in queenly attire, is found in king's palaces, the consort of priests and laymen, and is fed and pampered, and treated with delicacy, but concealed under many false names and pretenses. Disguise it as we may, its direful effects upon society cause a fearful trembling; its growth has been rapid, and who can divine how those elements may be stayed, and the fast-rising tide be kept from deluging the land?

No one who is capable of discerning good from evil can fail to see that war has its foundation in error. If we cast our eyes over America's broad lands to-day—said to be a home of liberty for the oppressed of all nations, races and colors—and see the maimed who were wounded in battle in the recent civil war, and hear the moans of widows, bereft of means of support, and witness their tender offspring crying for bread, we at once decide that war is a product of fiendish passions.

If there ever was a justifiable war, perhaps it was the late American conflict. Millions of human beings, whose limbs could tire, and whose hearts could throb with grief, had plead in vain through long years of anguish for relief. And when their masters refused to hear, they sent up strong cries to God for some redress, and seemingly no answer came. Then they imploringly asked, "Is there no pity in the hearts of men, and no mercy in heaven?" There were many hearts that pitied, but were powerless to relieve. All true philanthropists denounced chattel slavery as a base wrong done to humanity, and a great sin against God, who is the author of all existences. In the nation's extremity, when neither moral suasion nor appeals to conscience caused oppression to cease, the sword became the arbiter, and through blood and battle the captives' chains were broken, and civil liberty was a boon to all of the male population. But lovers of justice, and advocates of universal freedom, irrespective of sex, caste or color, deprecated war as much as slavery. They had not lost faith in God, nor confidence in humanity, and believed there might have been a peaceful solution of the vexed question.

If the North—who in reality shared the product of slave labor, and in principle upheld the slave power as much as did the people of the South—had opened the public treasury [The speaker must have forgotten how often and earnestly this was offered by Lincoln, Greeley and others previous to and after the beginning of war.—Ed.] and offered to remunerate slaveholders if they would liberate their bondmen, then have passed laws bearing equally upon North and South, forever prohibiting chattel slavery in the United States, many believed, and still believe, that bloodshed might have been avoided. Others claim that the love of slavery was so deeply rooted in the hearts of those who were born under its influence and reared amid its surroundings, that it was so interwoven with their very existence, nothing short of dire force would have caused them to relinquish their stronghold, for they verily thought they could not live without it.

If there could have been a peaceful settlement of the slave question without resorting to arms, and those who were slain in battle had been left to pursue the practical duties of life, providing for their families, who to a large extent are now dependent upon subsidies from the national treasury, would there not have been a great gain, financially? How much would have been left in the public coffers that could be turned to relieve the widow and fatherless, the needy natives, and strangers who are cast upon our shores at the present time?

War, even if we claim that it be a contest for principle and right, therefore justifiable, is appalling to every sensitive heart. Its fruits may be seen in almost every form of vice, in hamlets and cities, from the Atlantic to the Pacific shores, showing its demoralizing effects upon character.

The advocates of peace principles are doing a noble work. We pray that they may have courage and strength to continue in well-doing, to work in the sunshine and in the storm, until they receive the reward of their labors. Nothing less than the triumph of their cause will give rest and satisfy such toiling spirits.

Peace and temperance are inseparable companions: when we pray for the success of one, the other is included. All lovers of humanity who desire the peace and prosperity of the nations of the earth will give their best efforts, through faith and prayer, to call down divine influences from higher spheres to aid the work and sustain the laborers.

If we would remedy the evils of war and intemperance, we must trace them to their primal source, the fountain whence they originate, and this will require some deep digging. If we would kill the life of a tree, we must find and strike the life-root; we might use the pruning-knife from age to age and lop off its branches, and it would chance to live and produce fruit. In like manner, if we attempt to dry up or destroy a large body of water, we do not think to lade it out with a bucket, but rather seek to find and cut off its source of supply.

We see God, and hear His voice, in the various reforms of our time, and rejoice to see woman stretching forth her hands in the cause of right. Her influence is needed, and will prove a strong power for good, and, when fully awake to the glorious truth that God is dual—that in Deity we have an all-wise Father and loving Mother, coöperating in harmony to save, bless and happyify their children, who are one in spirit and purpose, then we shall better understand our duties and responsibilities, and how we may uplift humanity to better conditions. And in the language of the poet we say, "Fly swiftly round, ye wheels of time, and bring the welcome day," when woman shall be free and stand in her proper place, a co-worker with man in every good word and work. That is the lever that will move the world to higher and better relations.

STILL ON THE WING.

—O—

MY DEAR ELDER LOMAS:

Grace and mercy; peace and good will to you and the "Zion of our God"—that God who is Father and Mother, wisdom and love.

With pen-and-ink I greet you this morning from the sunny south-land of our country. And although it is yet February, the people of the Crescent City have made their gardens and mown their lawns. The yards are full of roses, and the orange trees fragrant with white blossoms, prophecy of a golden fruitage. But as all pictures have—and necessarily so—a back-ground, it is but justice done, to say further, that the effects of the late civil war linger—that the times are very hard—that the fogs of New Orleans are damp and dismal—while in the night-time, blood-hunting musketoes hum infernal music around my pillow. Sleep departs, and I often fail to coax it back by singing to myself, even that dear good song—"God is infinitely able."

On my way to New Orleans I stopped two nights at South Union, lecturing twice and attending one religious meeting. The angels were with us; and there seemed to be an outpouring of the spirit. I believe in a perpetual revival—a constant growth in grace—progression! Paul said, "Go on unto perfection"—

"So run that ye may obtain"—"Work out your own salvation." To work—to "run" is not to stand still. I find in all organizations individuals who are exquisitely delighted with the biblical passage—"Wait on the salvation of the Lord." And waiting, they nod, sleep, die—and while thus dead, spiritually dead, they often walk about in the grave-clothes of a rotting conservatism, and think themselves alive. It is a strange delusion.

The ministry, the elders, and the believers, all received me most cordially. Their welcome was soul-felt, and proved an oasis—a very blessing to my soul. If possible, considering other engagements, I shall call again at South Union on my return north.

In Memphis, Tenn., I lectured three Sundays to very large audiences. The people seemed interested and awake. With Doctor Watson and others in this city, spiritualism is a practical and a saving power. They have recently had startling manifestations here through the mediumship of Mrs. Miller. In some respects they are far superior to those you and I witnessed at the Eddys. In the open field, by starlight, spirits often appear clothed in white and walk by her side. Dr. Samuel Watson, Mr. Silliman, Mr. Miller and myself witnessed this phenomenon one evening out on the common, adjacent to the city. It was for the moment the mount of transfiguration. "Without a vision the people perish," said a prophet in olden times. Vision and trance—inspirations and revelations constitute, in a measure, the life of the soul.

The principles that underlie the platform of Believers:—purity, and "all things in common;—peace and perpetual revelations—are immutable. They are the methods—the doors that open into the kingdom whither the resurrected have entered. Well said Jesus under the influence of the Christ-spirit—"I am the way, the truth and the life."

Pardon me for a bit of philosophising, concerning moral, evil and wicked spirits. That man is a moral being, no solid thinker disputes. But moral being implies moral law, and moral law implies not only conscience and freedom, but moral government and compensation.

Conscience, in connection with moral judgment, ever prompts to the right; but the reasoning and reflecting organs, in connection with moral consciousness, must ever determine what that right is. This applies to every scale of human life. "Green apples are good," says a spiritualist writer—"good in their place, as the ripened ones of October." The proposition is a bald sophism. Neither green nor ripened apples are good. No moral quality inheres in apples. They are neither "good" nor evil, because moral qualities pertain to moral beings—not unconscious fruit, or blind forces.

There is a class of pseudo-philosophers who tell us there is "no moral evil in the universe"—only a graded good. Is a positive lie a lower degree of truth? malice a lower degree of love? and rape a lower degree of chastity? To enunciate is to reveal the terrible hideousness of such reasoning. Good and evil are moral conditions, each real and positive, according as it becomes the leading force in purpose or quality of character. And the higher the moral altitude attained, the more exquisitely keen are the soul's distinctions between good and evil.

All moral acts pertain to the intellectual and spiritual, and not to the body, except mediately. Can the foot of a corpse tread on forbidden ground? Is it the fleshly hand that steals? Are not these rather the implements of conscious force operating in and through them? Without this intelligence, or spirit, man is but a corpse, and a corpse never violates either physical or moral law. The body does not sin. Constituted of physical elements, it can know nothing of moral or immoral acts. And death, which is only a severing of this outer envelope from the spiritual, affects in no way the real, immortal man. Each, at death, goes, Judas-like, to "his own place."

All sensations, all thought, reason, moral responsibility, pertain to soul—the inner-thinking man. Accordingly, the shrewd and the selfish, the wicked and the evil-minded, enter the spirit world as such, and are there denominated evil spirits. Nature knows no spasms. Sudden leaps from vice to virtue, from folly to wisdom, are contrary to the processes of development. The same clairvoyant and phenomenal evidences through mediums that prove the existence of spirits, prove the existence of unregenerate, or evil spirits.

In New Testament times, these evil spirits were termed "demons." And that eminent church writer, Dr. Lardner, says: "The notion of demons, or the souls of the dead, having power over living men, was universally prevalent among the nations of those times, and believed by many Christians." Jesus addressed these demons—that is, evil-disposed spirits—as thinking, conscious individualities, and commanded them, as beings distinct from the obsessed, to "depart." There are obsessed mediums in this age; and there are those gifted with power to "cast out these demons."

Although we term them "demons," we must not forget that they were once mortals, and are still our brothers, though occupying the lower spheres of spirit life. They are also the subjects of progression, and the objects of God's love. To such—denominated by Peter "spirits in prison"—Jesus preached, after being "put to death in the flesh" upon Calvary. And the fact of his preaching to them implies that they could be benefited and regenerated by this preaching, or these moral efforts in their behalf. Progress is open to all orders of beings in the future life—spirits becoming angels, angels archangels, and these Arsaphs, and thus onward toward the Infinite.

The prevention of obsessing influences lies in the pure purpose and the good life, in the cultivation of broad aspirational aims, a firmness of moral principle, a determined desire to do right, and a calm trust in the overshadowing presence of God and good angels.

In Shaker assemblages, as in spiritual seances, truth attracts the true, wisdom the wise, charity the charitable, unselfishness the angelic, and purity the pure and holy that walk the heavenly fields of immortality.

.... I would never choose to withdraw myself from the labor and common burden of the world; but I do choose to withdraw myself from the push and the scramble for money and position. Any man is at liberty to call me a fool, and say that mankind are benefited by the push and the scramble in the long run. But I care for the people who live now and will not be living when the long-run comes. As it is, I prefer going shares with the unlucky. —George Eliot.

SWEDENBORGIANISM.

—O—

[From the New Jerusalem Messenger.]

I. God is one in essence and in person, in whom there is a distinct and essential Trinity, called in the Word the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and the Lord Jesus Christ is this God, and the only true object of worship.

II. In order to be saved, men must believe on the Lord, and strive to obey his commandments, looking to him alone for strength and assistance, and acknowledging that all life and salvation are from Him.

III. The Sacred Scriptures, or the Divine word, is not only the Revelation of the Lord's will and the history of his dealings with men, but also contains the infinite treasures of his wisdom expressed in symbolical or correspondential language, and therefore in addition to the sense of the letter, there is in the word an inner or spiritual sense, which can be interpreted only by the law of correspondence between things natural and things spiritual.

IV. Now is the time of the second coming of the Lord, foretold in Matt. xxiv, and the establishment of the new church signified by the New Jerusalem in Revelation xxi, and this second coming is not a visible appearance on earth, but a new disclosure of divine truth and the promulgation of true Christian doctrine, effected by means of the Lord's servant, Emanuel Swedenborg, who was specially instructed in this doctrine, and commissioned to publish it to the world.

V. Man's life in the material body is but the preparation for eternal life, and when the body dies man immediately rises into the spiritual world, and, after preparation in an intermediate state, dwells for ever in heaven or hell, according to the character acquired during his earthly life.

VI. The spiritual world, the eternal home of man after death, is not remote from this world, but is in direct conjunction with it, and we are, though unconsciously, always in immediate communion with angels and spirits.

THE HORRORS OF SECTARIAN SUPREMACY.

—O—

A. B. BRADFORD.

In Scotland, the Catholics having at first the power, persecuted the Protestants in common. The Prelatists mounted the next wave, and overwhelmed the unhappy Presbyterians. Then the Presbyterians in their time, came into power and wreaked their vengeance on the Prelatists. Then the tide turned under James II, and the Presbyterians had again to bite the dust. Thus it was in England and all over Europe, till the earth was fattened with blood, shed in the unholy cause of persecution. So it would be in this country. Even in this enlightened age, there is no man, no set of men, no church, great nor small, that can be trusted with absolute dominion over the human conscience for a single hour. In the minority and powerless, the ecclesiastical or sectarian passion is as amiable and harmless as an unweaned cub. But invest it with power, and it becomes as ferocious and bloodthirsty as a Bengal tiger! Such is human nature in all ages and countries, when diabolized by the sectarian spirit.

THE HORRORS OF WAR.

—O—

The following extract, referring to the burning of Villareal, in Spain, is taken from a letter written by the Carlist General Castella. The writer had command of the fortifications at Villareal during a recent engagement:

"I have, during my life, witnessed some very sad scenes of war, and I thought I had seen the summit of human misery in the retreat of the Army of the East (in 1870), of which I commanded the rear guard. But I cannot recall any impression which can be compared with the feeling which I experienced on entering with Brigadier Valluerca the principal street of Villareal, when it was on fire from one end to the other. The crackling of the flames, whose red glare struggled against the light of the mid-day sun, the heavy crash of windows giving way, and of roofs falling in, the shrieks of frenzied women and the cries of the children, who ran with bare feet on the ashes, the grim despair of the old men, as they gazed with a dry eye and fixed stare upon the scene, the imprecations of the Carlist soldiers as parties of them rushed in hot pursuit of the incendiaries, the rattle of the musketry, all formed a horrible spectacle which baffles description. I saw in a side street, between two burning houses, a woman lying stretched out on a mattress, surrounded by little children half-naked, who were uttering piercing cries. The atmosphere was unbearable. The flames all but licked the paths; the burning ruins were falling down on all sides quite close to them; and this family, abandoned in the confusion, were about to be either roasted or crushed. I got off my horse which was dreadfully frightened by the flames and the noise around, and I went up to where the sick woman lay. She was paralyzed. Her husband, a mule-driver, was away. Some soldiers had carried her out of the house before setting fire to it. The only thing left her—and that by mere good luck—was the mattress on which she was lying. The heat was becoming more and more intense; their faces were crimson; the children, in their agony, redoubled their shrieks; their poor mother, as she looked at them, weeping, and calling the Holy Virgin to her aid. What could be more heartrending than this picture, framed, as it were, in fire?"

When the late war began, a young man, the only son of a widow, who had been fascinated by Mr. Beecher's preaching, was moved by his patriotic exhortations and influence to enlist, and was presently killed in battle. His body was brought home and Mr. Beecher, going to the house, led the mother to the coffin, and said to her that there lay her son before her dead; that the young man, the hope of her life and the stay of her age, had been murdered, cruelly murdered, and that he, Beecher, was the assassin. And thereupon he burst into so passionate a paroxysm of self-accusation and reproach that the mother became his comforter instead of receiving consolation from him. Such an incident, entirely consonant with what is known of Mr. Beecher, would find a natural place in the pious chronicles. —Harper's Weekly.

WHAT KIND OF INK SHALL WE USE?

—O—

ASCENATH C. STICKNEY.

To the above query we offer a reply gratis: All persons who write remarks as sensible as those which we copy from the December SHAKER of 1875, should use the best black ink:

"To all who write expecting others to read what they write, we respectfully suggest, that you wait until you have an idea—an idea that will interest some one beside your own dear self."

"When sure that you have an idea, put that idea into the fewest possible words."

We consider the above excellent advice; and will endeavor to act upon it in all our future efforts of this kind. Should we succeed in obtaining any new ideas, will present such to the press in plain black ink.

We take the liberty to suggest that all who write sentiments of christian kindness and love, good advice to friend or foe, sentiments of affection even, scientific facts or sensible reasoning on any subject worthy of record, should favor the members of the press by using the kind of ink to which we have referred.

Novels, scandal, gossip, unkind criticism—political or social—may be traced in pale blue ink, or paler purple, as these varieties invariably fade by exposure to the sun and atmosphere, in a very short time. Could many articles of the character above-named be traced in purple, a reasonable time before being sent to press, we presume that much that is objectionable would fade before developing into a certainty. Would not its absence be a blessing to youthful humanity?

We are not aware that the delicate hues of Carmine, Aniline, or Prussian Blue, ever qualify poor chirography, or make rapid thought more agreeable. Nor can we believe that any variety of ink adds symmetry to the outline of letters carelessly cut; neither does tinted paper respond more readily to original thought than the pure simple white.

In fact, the strong crisp words of our noble Anglo-Saxon tongue, require the positive medium of white and black to represent to the eye their true character.

Pardon us then, dear friends, if we solicit the more extensive use in future, of plain black ink. Especially should all youthful writers send their thoughts to superiors in this highly esteemed preparation.

NOBODY.

—O—

THE publisher of THE SHAKER sent the following poem to the editor, on Valentine's day. Unable to decide whether any thing personal was intended, we lay it before the jury of our readers. We do not know to whom to give credit, but there's gospel, wit and wisdom in it.—Ed.

If nobody's noticed you you must be small,
If nobody's slighted you you must be tall;
If nobody's bowed to you you must be low,
If nobody's kissed you you're ugly we know.

If nobody's envied you you're a poor elf,
If nobody's flattered you you've flattered yourself;
If nobody's cheated you you are a knave,
If nobody's hated you you are a slave.

If nobody's called you a fool to your face,
Somebody's wished for your back in its place;
If nobody's called you a tyrant or scold,
Somebody thinks you a spiritless mold.

If nobody knows of your faults but a friend,
Nobody will miss them at the world's end;
If nobody clings to your purse like a fawn,
Nobody'll run like a hound when its gone.

If nobody's eaten his bread from your store,
Nobody'll call you a miserly bore;
If nobody's slandered you—here is our pen,
Sign yourself "Nobody"—quick as you can.

SLOW PROGRESS OF KNOWLEDGE.

—O—

WE copy the following interesting passage from the recent address of Dr. B. C. Hohbs, at the laying of the corner-stone of the Rose Polytechnic Institute at Terre Haute, Ind.:

Civilization cannot be wrought out in a day. It took Christianity generations to evangelize the nations under the teachings of the Divine Author and His inspired disciples, even in an age of civilization; much longer does it take learning and art to rise above the power of ignorance, indolence, superstition and the customs inherited from ancestors.

All pioneer inventors have felt the strength of this combination against any new mode of increasing the products of industry.

Many years ago an engineer, for amusement, hunted the chamois on the plateau of Mount Piletus, in Switzerland, where he found a lofty forest of inaccessible pine timber, nearly nine miles from Lake Lucerne. By the aid of a few Swiss gentlemen, he executed a design to construct a trough or slide, such as we see on mountain sides, or along our river hills, to convey wood and timber to accessible points. It passed sometimes by tunnels through hills, again on supports 100 feet high, or hung to the rocky mountain side. Timbers would pass the entire distance in three minutes, or at the rate of 180 miles an hour. The intense friction caused them to ignite, and at the base they would plunge twenty feet into the earth. These difficulties were readily overcome by turning a stream of water into the trough and plunging the timbers into Lake Lucerne, whence they were safely borne away to the Rhine to become material for constructing many an elegant home, or to be spars and beams and masts for ships that would visit either India and bear the strain of the storms of every sea. All this was the product of a little practical thinking, using only the inclined plane and the force of gravity; but the work was conducted among a peasantry, who charged the inventor with heresy, and with having communion with the devil.

When saw-mills and looms were invented, the common laborer became loud, revengeful, and clamorous for redress, not knowing that accumulating wealth only opens multiplied channels for well-paid industry, in its reinvestment.

It has been but little more than one hundred years since a great banking company of England were afraid to risk giving aid to Richard Arkwright, while constructing his spinning-jenny, which earned for its inventor more than $2,000,000; and since, James Brindley, at the request of the Duke of Bridgewater, planned a canal from his coal field of Worsley to Manchester, a distance of seven miles. It was to pass by aqueduct, forty feet over the Mersey, and again, by subterraneous tunnels through hills. On submitting his plans to the judgment of a distinguished engineer of that day, he received for criticism the cool remark, "I have often heard of air castles, but never before saw the place where one was to be built." The success of this invention soon led to a canal investment in England of more than $50,000,000.

It has been but about seventy years since Robert Fulton launched the Clermont and Car of Neptune on the Hudson in our age when all men were deprecating his "folly." He had an equal struggle with his own poverty and the want of public appreciation.

Even in this generation Congressmen have failed to be re-elected because they voted aid to Prof. Morse in the construction of the electric telegraph that now gathers the news of yesterday from every nation for our daily papers.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

WILL WE SUSTAIN THE STRUCTURE?

—O—

If any are in possession of better principles than those upon which Shakerism is founded, we are only happy that there are more fortunate souls than we are. But we do not apprehend that such is the case. We are believers in heavenly principles; that these same causes, ever and forever will produce heaven wherever exercised. The knowledge of heavenly principles is ours. If we exercise this knowledge, heaven is ours. If we fail to use such knowledge, disorder and discomfort will be ours, even in excess of those not thus enlightened. The gospel should be to us, not only the bow of promise, but the practical existence of salvation; not only the ark of safety, but a positive deliverance from the world, and into every good and perfect joy. Let us look at the heavenly ARC: VIRGINITY; CELESTIAL BROTHERHOOD, or EARTHLY EQUALITY; PEACE, and the blessings which flow from it; entire UNSPOTTEDNESS FROM THE WORLD! These are as firm as the Rock of Ages—as the heavens are eternal. On these, the HOUSE OF SHAKERISM has been erected; on which it has firmly stood through the tempestuous seasons of ridicule and persecution; has flourished; has saved; has ever held out the beacon of eternal life, to the sin-sick and sin-wrecked. Love has been the bond of union, that has acted the key-stone to this beautiful arc. Love for these principles collectively, is what makes the practical, desirable, model Shaker—fisher, and saviour of men! Reverence for either with irreverence for any, presents at best an unsavory, spotted hybrid. Even practical attachment to several, and not for all, savors only the possible and probable fall of the beautiful structure. Said Elder G. B. Avery: "There is no salvation in mere communism;" and, excepting salvation from the poor or leper-house, this is true. Considered separately, either principle of the Shaker arc has a similar value; and any evasion or negligence of entire conformity to the whole order of the temple, removes the key-stone of Angel Love, and razes the structure to worse than worldly institutions. Said a grand legal star of Albany, N. Y., when studying the Shaker Constitution: "Gentlemen, you have here something which cannot be broken, unless you break it yourselves!" Let us look about us, and see whether these principles are guarded and lived intact. Let the love and direction which led out of Egypt, still be ours to keep out! LET US HAVE A REVIVAL; and let it renew in us the most ardent consecration to gospel principles, with which the city of God, the paradise of Eden, the perfect love of gospel brethren and sisters may and will be ours FOREVER, and without which, let us consider our days narrowed down, and numbered as a people! From hence, let the joyful, revival song be: WE WILL SUSTAIN THE STRUCTURE. ★

MARTIN LUTHER, AND REFORMATION.

—O—

"From the year 1517, the beginning of the Reformation, to 1546, in which Luther died, nothing but the fruits of corrupt ambition are manifest on the whole face of history, during that period of more than twenty-eight years. Endless controversies, debates about diets and councils, violence and wars, are the distinguishing marks of those times of discord. And even the means, by which the Reformation was finally established, were as opposite to the precepts of the gospel, as bloodshed and robberies are opposed to peace and good will." Benj. S. Youngs. (Shaker.)

Could we ask for a better demonstration of Luther's adoption of the vicarious atonement introduced by Paul, than his remark to a comrade: "Be thou a sinner, and sin boldly; but still more boldly believe, and rejoice in Christ. From him, sin shall not separate us; no, though a thousand times in every day, we should commit fornication and murder!" Under his pernicious solifidian system of "Imputed Righteousness," he did commit fornication with the nun, Catharine a Bora; was excommunicated therefor by Rome; and were it not for this expulsion, there had been no Reformation. Luther was in full accord with the "Head of the Church" in England—Henry the Eighth,—who became such "Head," because Rome would not permit unlimited indulgence to his fleshy lusts. This lecherous beast, to further the aims and ends of his lusts for the flesh, and ambitions for power, had six wives; some of whom he killed, and to these, he added the sacrifice of 72,000 human beings! He hoped Luther's and Paul's atonement theory to be true.

Luther claimed to find ample evidence for such theory in Paul's writings, and in this, was he not correct? But when arriving at the matter-of-fact epistle of James, he rejected the whole of it, calling it "an epistle of straw;" then clinging to his beloved theory that "the just shall live by faith alone," left this as a legacy to his following generations, who hung the delusion, with an ardor which only the living truth of Christ's life is worthy of, and on which account, Jesus still weeps! ★

PEACE.

A LETTER from that lovable man, Alfred H. Love, inviting us to be a delegate to the Universal Peace Convention beginning on 10th of July, presents some novel features: The old hall in Philadelphia, where war was first declared, has been secured for the above Convention. The first two days are to be occupied by English speaking delegates; and several days thereafter, by other nationalities. A PEACE FORGE is to be erected on the Centennial Grounds, and the fulfilment of the long-desired prophecy inaugurated—by the transformation of swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks! Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith, has been invited to be one of the forge men. Whether we are there or not, friend Love, and all friends of Peace, we want your help in establishing "THE PEACE CONGRESS OF NATIONS!" ★

PAUL.

SECOND PAPER.

OUR first paper upon this eminent character has aroused an intemperate zeal in his admirers; who, dealing severely with us, are loud in the excellencies of their idol. The champions of Paul of old, would, probably, be first to rise in denunciation of any modern Paul, who, creating a new formula of doctrine, should contend for the same, at any and every expense of the vital principles of original and genuine christianity. This is just what Paul did; and his being successful in displacing the essential elements of christianity by his own peculiar theories, does not render him the less censurable. Confident that the Jews would not receive the gospel, as delivered by the twelve, we find Paul, in the entire ignorance of the disciples in Jerusalem, leaving them; and proclaiming himself the apostle of the Gentiles, entering Arabia, Damascus, Syria and Asia Minor, and here for a dozen years, laboring earnestly, making many converts, establishing churches, with which he kept up a continual correspondence, the general purport of which, was the denunciation of the law, and imbuing the people with a belief that Jesus was a God! That by his death the law became a nullity; that by a faith in him, all sins, past, present and future, should be forgiven. When we think that neither Jesus nor his apostles, had, up to this time, ever spoken of the law but with respect; and never, previous to the divergence of Paul, had alluded to any vicarious atonement of Jesus, we begin to see where and by whom these mischievous machinations were concocted. When the disciples heard of the incendiarism of Paul, they sent emissaries from Jerusalem to Antioch, charged with the duty of overturning such demonstrations of the ardent Paul, and to preach the sacredness of the law, and the necessity of its observance. This was a terrible blow to the infant Gentile church; and to its founder, who felt that all his labor was lost, unless he should go to Jerusalem, and obtain the disciples' indorsement of the system he had inaugurated. Paul arrives at Jerusalem; and the close reader is made aware that the discussions between him and the disciples were very violent. The disciples withstood Paul's proposals, finding no recognition therein of their master's teachings; and had they remained firm ever afterward, the church would have fallen away no sooner, and possibly, the world would not have been cursed, as it is with certain Paulism. Paul refused to yield; claiming that at his marvelous conversion, he came en rapport with Jesus, and declaring that he would continue his apostolate at all events. A compromise was effected—the first, between christianity and paganism—a downfall to that, a gain for this. Paul was to yield, so far as teaching a faithful observance of the law, while the balance of his views were considered non-essentials. But, Peter visiting Antioch, and there losing his justification among the Gentiles, James, (brother of Jesus, and real head of the church), addressed serious remonstrances to him, which had the effect of entirely separating him from the Gentiles, and weaning therefrom also, one Barnabas; through hearing of which circumstances, Paul's indignation lost all bounds, and he expressed himself so homely of the apostles, that in return, the second epistle of James was addressed to him, than which never was better christianity, and which was and is, an unanswerable argument against all objectionable Paulism. Paul, not only would not now submit to the apostles, but returned with all his force to his old tactics against the law. The apostles organized an opposing mission, (see Cor.) and we may judge of the gravity of the occasion, by the ardor of Paul in his own defense, reaching an egotistic climax in 2 Cor. xi: 5; et i. Cor. xv: 10; and yet the adherents to the original faith, completely carried the day. Paul returned to Jerusalem, a penitent; was required and made a public apology and entire recantation of unchristian Paulism; but so great had been the disturbance, the tribune arrested him, and confined him for a term of years; after which he preached Paulism unrestricted; and learning, that during his imprisonment the apostles in Judea were losing ground continually, invited them to Rome, where they became converts to Paulism. Even Peter, in his turn, quitted Judea, hastened to Rome, became the bosom companion of Paul; exceeded Paul, if possible, in doctrines that contained not Christ, and closes (2 Peter, III: 15,) with a stirring appeal for a thorough belief in the writings of Paul—the adulterator of the "faith once delivered to the saints"—and through which adultery, the original was lost beyond resurrection in their day. We yield to none in his admiration of Paul's christian teachings—nor to Beecher's—and 'tis only in opposition to the positively unchristian that we have attempted to raise our voice. ★

. . . A King's jester was once asked, "What kind of a place do you think Heaven to be?" "A place," said he, "where nought but good is spoken of the neighbor." "And in what," it was again urged, "does its supreme happiness consist?" "In the feeling that no one will slander me there, and that, if I have any faults it will be so unfashionable to speak of them that I and all will soon forget them."

LIFE'S SEASONS.

—O—

AMELIA CALVER,

On noblesse wings, time glides along
No hand can stay its rapid flight;
Life's brilliant spring will soon have flown,
While toiling summer's just in sight,
And ere we garner autumn's store
The wintry winds around us roar.

Carefully then, the good seed plant;
And wisely prune the growing vine.
Likewise in storing, prudent be;
And ripened age we'll peaceful find.
Each stage of life, if wisely spent,
Rears for the next, a monument.

MUSIC NO. 4.

—O—

ADVANCING a step farther into the interior recesses of the complicated, yet interesting subject of music, we come to recognize, in connection with the lungs, that wonderfully working organ—the diaphragm—which, in the language of physiologists, "is a flexible, circular partition that separates the respiratory from the digestive organs, and the chest from the abdomen. In a state of repose its upper surface forms an arch, the convexity of which is toward the chest. In forced expiration its upper point reaches as high as the fourth rib. In ordinary inspiration, it is depressed as low as the seventh rib, which increases the capacity of the chest." [See Cutter's Anatomy.] It is to be understood that these actions of the diaphragm take place when nature has not been superseded by long perverted habits which render these actions more or less imperfect. And it must be admitted as a fact proved by what is daily and hourly to be seen, that a comparatively inactive diaphragm is a fault exceedingly prevalent with a majority of singers; and no one fault in the music-department taxes the skill and patience of the teacher more than this. To remedy this fault is a part of the teacher's first duties in his arduous calling, and implies no less active and spirited exertions on the part of the pupil. But what to do, and how to do, is the point to be reached. Physiological investigation establishes the fact that in the respiratory process various muscles are brought into use, whose contraction and dilations are in part, at least—unconscious and involuntary. Foremost among these are the lower muscles of the trunk—anatomically termed abdominal, which, by their inward and upward contraction, act directly upon the diaphragm—giving it its ascending motion. The diaphragm, thus acted upon, imparts a pressure upon the lungs, equal in power to that which the diaphragm receives from the muscles. The lungs, thus acted upon by the diaphragm, are forced to exhaust themselves of the greater portion of air in their cells. The air, thus expelled, finds its escape from the system through channels whose various parts will be considered and treated upon in their proper time and place. The process, thus described, is called expiration. But as Nature abhors vacuity, the lungs cannot remain void of the element they are wanted to contain, hence a reverse process of action immediately ensues. A new supply of fresh air rushes in to fill the vacuum in the lungs causing them to expand in corresponding proportion to the amount of air inhaled. By this expansion, the thorax (great cavity of the chest), also expands by means of the concerted action of three sets of muscles, viz.: the intercostal at the lower, and the thoracic and pectoral muscles at the upper part of the trunk or chest. Simultaneous with these actions the abdominal muscles relax—the diaphragm descends in proportion to the pressure it meets from the inflation of the lungs. This process is called inspiration. Continuous through life are these alternate processes carried on—partly involuntary, and partly through power of the will:—especially the latter in regard to degree. Hence it becomes a fact beyond even a shadow of contradiction that in a majority of cases musical students quietly submit to a mere passive process of respiration—inhaling just air enough (and sometimes poorly at that) to merely exist, but falling far short of the proper quantity for promoting vigorous and healthy action of the blood. In this enfeebled condition the abdominal muscles lose their natural tension, the diaphragm becomes measurably inactive, the lungs and thorax become dwarfed in extension, and the whole system must yield inevitably to the fatal ravages of disease.

SHAKER APOTHEGMS.

Our life is like a calm lake; every act of our lives raises a wake on its surface which produces ripples from the center to the shore, even more; from shore to shore, from birth unto death.—G. B. Avery.

Our minds may pine and starve, being imprisoned by what we have obtained.—E. J. Neal.

Time is too precious to waste in useless murmuring.—Ibid.

Self-defense is natural; but like all good, its abuse becomes evil. We can so encase ourselves in armor of self-righteousness, that neither the advice of friends nor the criticism of foes can affect us. Thus, like a plant, shielded from storm and sunshine, living on its exhalations, we become dwarfed and undeveloped—unfit for either ornament or use.—Amelia Calver.

SHAKER DEFINITIONS.

—O—

F. W. EVANS.

RENEL—One who refuses obedience to the good principles and just laws of an organization—seeking to re-organize upon the basis of its evils.

The South rebelled against the truths that the North held theoretically—abstractly—while practically it was fattening upon the enforced labor of the Slave population.

REVOLUTIONIST—One who refuses obedience to the evil principles and unjust laws of an organization—seeking to re-organize upon the basis of its abstract truths and latent good.

In the American Revolution the North revolutionized against England—and against the South in the late dreadful war. In both the North was successful, as was Israel, against Benjamin. Benjamin was conquered, in the end, but Israel was dreadfully punished, because a partaker of the same sins for which he was punishing the tribe of Benjamin, and therefore received from and by Benjamin, corresponding retributive punishment.

SAINT—One who is relatively perfect in the good of the organization to which he or she belongs—as David.

SINNER—One who is a chronic violator of the good laws and principles of the people among whom he or she lives—as Solomon in the end of his career.

PROPHET—A medium, who is inspired by spirits of the coming dispensation, or degree, in the spirit world; or a saint, who, by faithful travail in the spirit and power of the order he or she is in, has progressed into the higher dispensation or degree.

The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy to the Gentile Christian world, Catholic, Greek and Protestant. It is ever and forever against marriage, war, and selfish private property, which creates class distinctions in society, rich and poor, bond and free, aristocracy, slavery and poverty.

Where there is no vision the people perish; and where there is no prophecy there is no progress.

"Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." Let not the people deny the inspiration and authority of the organization. And let not the authority of the organization suppress and kill the prophets of the day and time. They voice God.

HOW TO LIVE.

—O—

He liveth long who liveth well!
All other life is short and vain.
He liveth longest who can tell
Of living most for heavenly gain.

He liveth long who liveth well!
All else is being flung away:
He liveth longest who can tell
Of true things truly done each day.

Waste not thy being; back to Him
Who freely gave it, freely give;
Else is that being but a dream—
'Tis but to be, and not to live.

Be wise, and use thy wisdom well;
Who wisely speaks must live it too.
He is the wisest who can tell
How first he lived, then spoke the true.

Be what thou seemest; live thy creed;
Hold up to earth the torch divine;
Be what thou prayest to be made;
Let the great Master's steps be thine.

Fill up each hour with what will last;
Buy up the moments as they go;
The life above when this is past,
Is the ripe fruit of life below.

Sow truth, if thou the truth would'st reap;
Who sows the false shall reap the vain;
Erect and sound thy conscience keep;
From hollow words and deeds refrain.

Sow love, and taste its fruitage pure;
Sow peace, and reap its harvest bright;
Sow sunbeams on the rock and moor,
And find the harvest-home of light.

THE EAR.

—O—

In his treatise on physiology, Hinton gives us to understand that the passage of the ear does not require cleaning by us; nature undertakes the task, and in the healthy state fulfills it perfectly. Her means for cleansing the ear is the wax, which dries up into thin scales and peels off and falls away imperceptibly. In health the passage of the ear is never dirty, but an attempt to clean it will infallibly make it so. Washing the ear out with soap and water is bad; it keeps the wax moist when it ought to become dry and scaly, and makes it absorb dust. But the most hurtful thing is the introduction of the corner of a towel screwed up and twisted around. This proceeding irritates the passage and presses down the wax and flakes of skin upon the membrane of this tympanum, producing pain, inflammation and deafness. The washing should only extend to the outer surface, as far as the fingers can reach.

ENGRAFTED.

—O—

The Order of Trappist Monks has sent an agent to this country in the person of Brother Francis de Sales, who has been commissioned to purchase property in the State of Maryland, where it is proposed to erect a monastery and furnish it with grounds sufficiently extensive for the pursuit of agriculture, which is an important industry among the monks of La Trappe. Two hundred monks taken from monasteries in Ireland, France and Turkey will occupy a house which Brother Francis de Sales will temporarily rent, so that during the erection of the monastery and the laying out of the grounds the newly arrived monks may make themselves familiar with the customs of the country. They are expected to arrive about December. The rules which bind the Trappists are very stringent. Constant silence is one of their vows. They are permitted to eat no other food than vegetables and bread, water alone being allowed for drink. They sleep in their habit, or gown, on a low pallet, and their bedroom is a small square inclosure formed by curtains. The bell-ringer arouses them at two o'clock every morning, and after a few minutes allowed for their prayers at waking, another bell bids them fall into line, and move in solemn silence to their chapel. They toil unremittingly throughout the hours when prayer and other devotions are not in progress.

SPIRIT OF THE FARM.

—O—

Here's something worth money. Many farmers have otherwise valuable horses, but spoiled by the heavens. The Troy Budget is the first to publish this infallible remedy:

Forty shoemaker buds, one pound of resin, one pint ginger, half pound mustard, one pint unslacked lime, six ounces crown-tartar, four ounces guaiacum, one pound epsom salts; mix together and make into thirty parcels. Give one every morning in the horse's feed before watering him.

This is the first time this recipe has been printed. For half a century it has been guarded as a precious secret. We know of its having recently transformed a $100 horse into a $600 one.

WEALTH OF FARMER'S FOOD.

—O—

Few farmers realize that they have in possession the means for the most healthful and palatable food in the world. Cracked wheat, or dry wheat very coarsely ground in a coffee mill, can be variously associated with milk, eggs, butter and sweet cream, in methods that exceed the nectar of the gods! Our Angeline surprises us with the most delicious and sustaining hominy pudding. Corn, very coarsely ground, can be used in several manners to present the most happy, healthful food. Then, take oatmeal, with few accessories, and we have a grand variety, together with one of the best brain-making and muscle-making materials the world ever produced. A New Jersey man has kept both wolf and doctor from his door; grown his whole family of five into better health this entire winter, on fifteen cents worth of oatmeal per week, added to milk and eggs. When we think that a gill of oatmeal will supply a meal to about seven persons, its economy in use must be at once apparent. Farmers, you have a wealth of food and health in your granaries that ought to be developed; and a better than gold mine or oil well on every acre of your farm. Find it. Look on our front cover, and write Bogle & Lyles, if you have no store of material on hand. *

Most farmers are severe on their boots and shoes. Running the heel down and over ruins foot wear. We have found that Lyon's Stiffeners are worth many times their cost, on one pair of boots. Try them, farmers. *

ARAB HORSE MAXIMS.

—O—

Let your colt be domesticated and live with you from his tenderest age, and when a horse he will be simple, docile, faithful, and inured to hardship and fatigue.

If you have your horse to serve you on the day of your trial, if you desire him to be a horse of truth, make him sober, accustomed to hard work, and inaccessible to fear.

Do not beat your horses, nor speak to them in a loud tone of voice; do not be angry with them, but kindly reprove their faults; they will do better thereafter, for they understand the language of man and its meaning.

If you have a long day's journey before you, spare your horse at the start; let him frequently walk to recover his wind. Continue this until he has sweated and dried three times, and you may ask him whatever you please, he will not leave you in difficulty.

Use your horse as you do your leathern bottle; if you open it gently and gradually you can easily control the water within, but if you open it suddenly the water escapes at once, and nothing remains to quench your thirst.

Observe your horse when he is drinking at a brook. If in bringing down his head he remains square, without bending his limbs, he possesses sterling qualities, and all parts of his body are built symmetrically.

Four things he must have broad—front, chest, loins and limbs; four things long—neck, breast, forearm and croup; four things short—pasterns, back, ears and tail.

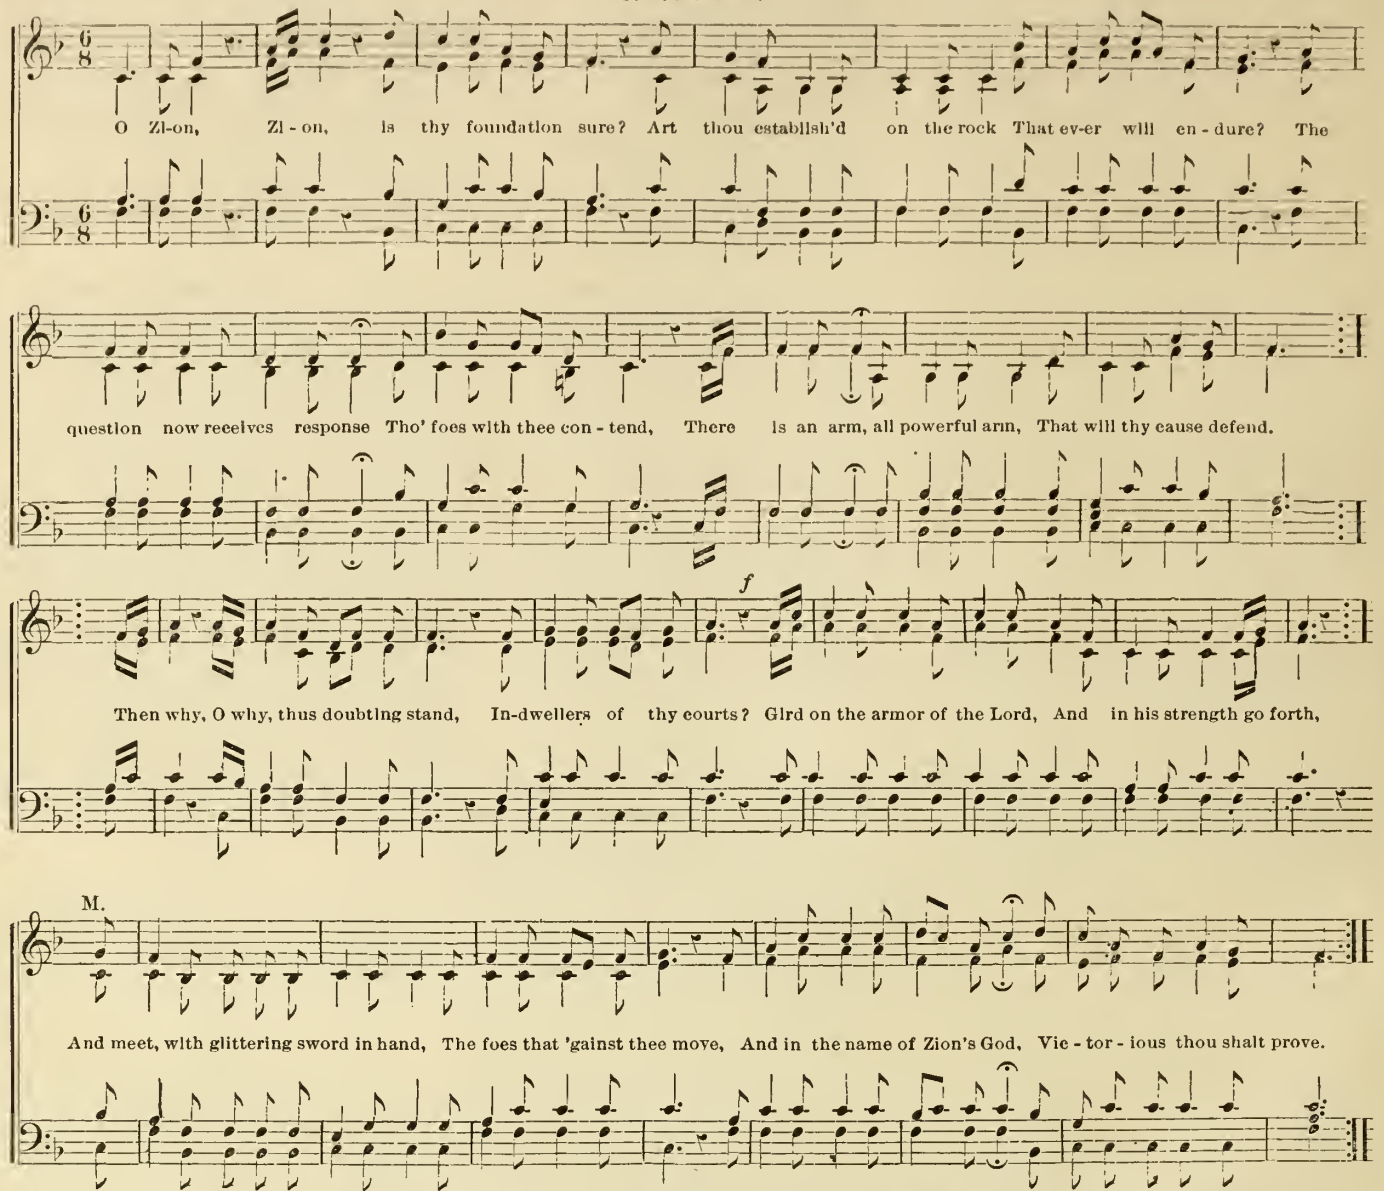

THE MEDAL IS PRESCOTT'S.

—O—

Elder J. S. Prescott is pronounced, by the publisher of THE SHAKER, worthy of all praise, and to the first premium which any has to bestow, for the largest, and still augmenting list of subscribers to THE SHAKER. Let him wear the medal with gospel pride. *

ZION'S DEFENSE.

J. G. RUSSELL.

O Zi-on, Zi-on, is thy foundation sure? Art thou establish'd on the rock That ev-er will en-dure? The question now receives response Tho' foes with thee con-tend, There is an arm, all powerful arm, That will thy cause defend.

Then why, O why, thus doubting stand, In-dwellers of thy courts? Gird on the armor of the Lord, And in his strength go forth,

M.
And meet, with glittering sword in hand, The foes that 'gainst thee move, And in the name of Zion's God, Vie-tor-ious thou shalt prove.

THOUGHT FOOD.

.... If the proposition of abolishing clerical patronage in Prussia is adopted, there will be quite a revolution in the interests of the church. In connection with the Roman Catholic church there are over 1,000 ecclesiastical offices in the gift of private patrons, about 500 in that of the state, and 5,200 in that of the bishops.

.... The Sacramento Record-Union considers the custom of appointing chaplains to legislative bodies "a remnant of barbarism," and wants to see it abolished.

OLD AND YOUNG. — An old constitution is like an old bone — broken with ease, mended with difficulty. A young tree bends to the gale, an old one snaps and falls before the blast. A single hard lift; an hour of heating work; a run to catch a departing train; an evening of exposure to rain or damp; a severe chill; an excess of food, the unusual indulgence of any appetite or passion; a sudden fit of anger; an improper dose of medicine — any of these or other similar things may cut off a valuable life in an hour, and leave the fair hopes of usefulness and enjoyment but a shapeless wreck.

BOOK TABLE NOTICES.

POLITICS FOR YOUNG AMERICANS: BY CHARLES NORDHOFF. The title of this book will mislead many, unless they consider how wide a field the word politics covers. In it we have letters, from a father to his son, teaching him the necessity of government; its various phases; the rights, duties and honors of citizenship; of the various official characters connected with governments; of taxes, property; usury laws, banks, banking and credit; in short, a valuable multum in parvo of cosmology, in a governmental line. It should be in the hands of every boy and girl in the land — the future voters, and legislators of our states and country. It concludes with the "Constitution of the United States" — "Declaration of Independence," and "Washington's Farewell Address." Published by Harpers, New York.

THE POEMS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH. The same publishers send us a beautiful copy of selections by the talented Goldsmith, edited by W. J. Rolfe. Copious notes on the poems, find a good ventilation in their proper place. Among others, the poems "Traveler," "Deserted Village," "Retaliation," are made very prominent. To many, Goldsmith is a favorite author; and to such, we only need call attention that this beautiful book is issued, to insure it a large sale

THE POPE'S HOUSEHOLD.

ACCORDING to the Official Annual of the Vatican, the household of Pius IX. is composed of 20 major domos, chamberlains, &c., 190 domestic prelates, 170 supernumerary armed private attendants, 6 armed ditto, 30 officers, constituting the staff of the Noble Guard, and 60 privates, about 130 supernumerary armed private followers, 20 attendants of honor in violet uniforms, about 70 others for outside the city, 14 officers of the Swiss and Palatine Guards, 7 private chaplains, 50 honorary ditto, 7 ditto for outside the city, 20 private priests and ordinary supernumerary chaplains, 10 intendants, equestrians, &c., 50 ushers and others. The whole gives 1,160 persons, to which must be added the Sacred College.

TO EVERGREEN SHORES.

DEATH OF JESSE WELLS, THE OLDEST MAN IN ALBANY COUNTY.

Jesse Wells, aged 98 years, resident of the Shakers for more than seventy-five years, while on his knees at prayer, less than a week ago, fell backward, shocking his system beyond recovery, and from which cause he died on Saturday afternoon. He was the last of a remarkable family of ten, all of whom died at the Shakers at an average age of over 75 years. Elder Jesse Wells lived to the longest period. At the last census he was the oldest man in Albany county, and the Shakers were exceedingly hopeful that he would have reached his centennial. — Albany Evening Times, March 6.

Died at Shakers, N. Y., March 9, 1876. ABBY MESSENGER, aged 63.

Enfield, Conn., Feb. 7, 1876, EUNICE STORER, aged 92.

VALUE OF MEAT AND VEGETABLES AS FOOD.

It is found that since the employment of the changed dietary in the garrison for Scotland, involving a very slight proportion of meat, the health of the inmates has been strikingly improved. For all adult male prisoners under sentence of nine months and not exceeding two years, the diet formerly consisted of bread, oatmeal, barley, one ounce of meat per day made into soup, with succulent vegetables, and twenty ounces of skimmed milk or buttermilk; on one day of the week fish was substituted for meat. The new diet comprises but a very spare quantity of meat, a moderate amount of milk being given instead. It is stated to be no uncommon thing to find that among the agricultural laborers of Scotland no meat is consumed, oatmeal and milk forming their staple articles of diet.

"WE WILL SUSTAIN THE STRUCTURE."

J. G. RUSSELL.

Dedicated to the Editor of THE SHAKER.

We will sus-tain the structure God's great and glorious plan, Which he In mer-cy has revealed, To poor be-nigh-ted man.

Deliverance from all evil, Redemption's praise it brings; We leave the haunts of Bab - y - lon, "To dwell 'mid better things."

2. We will sustain the structure, we will not let it fall;
It is the burden of our lives,—Our holy heavenly call.
Intrusted to our keeping, Unhlemished to remain;
The structure God has reared to us, We will, we will sustain.

3. We will sustain the structure, Whatever be the cost;
It is the glory of our lives,—Without it we are lost.
It worketh peace within us, And universal love;
It brings us into unison, With angel spheres above.

4. We will sustain the structure, For by its light and power,
From Egypt's thralldom we were drawn, In deep affliction's hour.
The rolling, rolling waters, Through which our journey lay,
Were, by the power of God's own hand, Controlled and kept at bay.

5. We will sustain the structure, Its noble form shall stand
Unchanged, in all its purity,—The same as God hath planned.
We will sustain the structure, God, he our help and stay,
Throughout our earthly pilgrimage, Throughout eternal day.

DEAR EDITOR:—On reading your article in the April number, on the evening of the 21st, in our Lyceum, the above hymn suggested itself to me, which I now send with haste to you, that you may also enjoy the sensation before it gets to be old. I send it in its simplicity, without any intention or desire to have it published; but, simply as a pleasing token of gospel love and affection from your brother for you. JAMES G. RUSSELL.

EVENING HOUR OF A RADICAL.

—O—
O. C. HAMPTON.

IT is wise to consider that in the sublime phenomena of evolution, new inspirations, improved views and progressed thoughts are continually appearing on the surface. These, with their various combinations, and translation into practical life, constitute human progression. Neither educational bias, habits, passions, nor emotions (made agreeable by long use), should array themselves in opposition to the spirit of progress, nor to the evolution of high and higher truths, nor to holy and holier obedience thereunto. Truth can never be in opposition to itself; but it is one of the commonest of episodes for some humanity, to become alarmed for the safety of a notion or doctrine, long entertained, but perhaps never investigated for five consecutive minutes—to feel very much annoyed, if some one, by word or other challenge, deems it unworthy of veneration. Still, the ever recurring question is: What is truest and best? And can we ignore this appeal to our intelligence and conscience, and yet be true to ourselves? It is, I think, the dictate of wisdom to leave all questions open to the fullest investigations. A refusal to investigate a subject, fearing, lest it may overturn some pet theory, is an open avowal of insincerity; and how can we be true to ourselves, or in tranquil at-one-ment with God, if we are insincere? Besides, a refusal to examine any new evolution for fear of discovering some phases which may collide with our own preconceived and settled ideas of right, is cowardly, to say the least, and shows a willingness to shrink from the painful sacrifice of cherished notions, rather than possess the pearls of pure truth. Is such not an unhealthy state of mind? Is it not a case of mental dyspepsia? Some of our writers have declared that we are in a state of transition—on the periphery of an old cycle,—and just about to cross the borders thereof into a new sphere. Is this not a good time to investigate and discuss many points in our practice and discipline, which have no inherent fixedness in themselves, but do now and must forever move upon a sliding scale of circumstances, undergoing more or less modification, in order to musically vibrate in rhythmic harmony with the sublime law of evolution and progress? To transmute all that is good, true, beautiful, into higher forms of loveliness, and lay hold on still higher and holier truths; and incorporating them into practical life as soon as discovered, seem to me to be the religious duties of every one who believes in the doctrine of Christianity. If there is any unnecessary friction in our community machinery, it can never be removed by ignoring its existence, through fear of any consequences. Pouring on oil, though good in many cases, will not answer in all; certainly, if positive reconstruction is in any place necessary. Celibacy, community of goods, confession of sins, and Peace, are the primal principles and obligations of all Believers; and no Society of our people can live without them. Questions, in nowise compromising these, might be continually discussed, investigated and improved by us. Take a general question: Are all the talents, intellect, spiritual faculties and usefulness of every member fully called out and appropriated to the best possible advantage of the whole? Again, are there not means, not yet brought into active requisition, whereby a greater amount of talent, now lying latent, might be brought into fuller use? I suppose, the object of our paper is to circulate useful knowledge in every direction the world over, and to our own Societies in particular. With this aim only in view, have I made the above suggestions; and shall my motions be seconded?

PROPER FOOD, OR WHAT SUBSTITUTE?

—O—
F. W. EVANS.

ELDER F. W. EVANS, in a recent letter to this office, appears moved to TESTIFY THUS EARNESTLY:

"Fine flour is a skeleton in every Society of Believers to-day. All the elements that go to make up a human body and mind, must be supplied by the food usually appropriated, or there will be a want—a constitutional want—and this will call for some substitute in place of the normal element.

"Condiments, alcohol, tobacco, etc., are substitutes—even meat is a substitute. Wheat contains all that a human body needs as solid food. Eaten as the apostles ate it, fresh from the field, is good. Whatever else is done to it after threshing and winnowing, let us be jealous of—grinding, bolting, packing, raising, baking, etc.—let us look out for! Is your wheat all there, unseparated, unkilld, unpoisoned? There is a rest—a satisfied rest—remaining to the victor, who supplies the system with normal food in proper quantities. There is no more hunger for the abnormal. The first Believers, as a class, warred with neither small nor great evils excepting the lusts of the flesh—the abuses of the reproductive functions. The second class will direct their batteries against the abuses of the digestive powers as well. In both cases, the enemies to be conquered are within the individual or among the body of Believers. I can hear, coming up from the uttermost parts of the earth: "GLORY TO THE RIGHTEOUS IN PHYSIOLOGY!"

LITTLE SINS.

—O—
DANIEL ORCUTT.

"A little sin is no harm!" These words have caused more destruction to human souls, than perhaps all the rest of Satan's artillery! A little of the forbidden fruit, urged the arch tempter, to the Mother of mankind, will do no harm; it will, on the contrary, open your eyes to behold hidden mysteries! The unsuspecting pair believed too readily, and we know the consequences. It is by little and little, that sin increases in strength upon its victims by repetition; until it overpowers their fortitude and bids defiance to their noblest resolutions. It is astonishing how some imperceptibly yield to vice, and how firmly they adhere to it. They begin with very slight departures from strict honesty; which hardly seem to carry "the appearance of evil," and go on, from bad to worse, till they finish their criminal career by a bold plunge into certain destruction! Nothing is more obvious than the connection between the beginning and the termination of sinful practices; yet how difficult to convince the young of its reality. When entering upon the "broad road," they do not seem to have the least fear of the fatal issue; but think they can easily effect an escape when dangers appear; but soon "their bands are made strong," and ere they are aware, they are bound by the iron grasp of that monster, vice, and ruined! We often feel the greatest security when in the greatest danger! "Who is afraid? not I," has been the destruction of thousands! "Let those who think they stand, take heed lest they fall!" No one suddenly becomes depraved and abandoned; the beginnings are small, like the leak in the ship, or the hole in the levee; but the stain to the soul will appear. Some think that little sins are not bad, provided great ones are not committed; others believe they are a little bad, but in so small degree that no record is kept. No mistake is more fatal than this; it is the way that vice maintains its dominion on this earth; the standing cause of ruin to the souls of millions! Vice, after thousands of years in destroying souls, has become a powerful agent; and to be safe from its enticements, the voice of conscience must be regarded, in little things. Let all beware of the first wrong step! Here is the chief danger. It lies in venturing upon little indulgences, slight violations of conscience. The only safeguard is, "avoid the appearance of evil;" "watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." Watch! the enemy is in close pursuit, perhaps unseen, along your path! Keep your armor on; he will strike unawares! "A prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself; the simple (rejecting the counsel of the wise) pass on and are punished."

MORAL COURAGE.

—O—
JAS. S. PRESCOTT.

I OFTEN think of the noble sentiment offered by Elder F. W. Evans, at our Cleveland Convention. Before entering the hall, he said, "Brethren, let us lay aside all personalities, and go in and speak to the people as the Spirit may give us utterance." In common parlance it is said that Noah built the ark; Solomon built the temple; U. S. Grant conquered the rebel armies; but such were not the facts; for while others did the work, these received the praise.

They were entitled to their share of credit in common with the rest who did the work; and no more. All praise belongs to no human being, but to God, the source of all good. The meed of praise awarded me in April issue, for canvassing, does not belong to me as an individual, but to the community of which I am only a component part, therefore I respectfully decline wearing the medal.

With moral courage, let us canvass for "THE SHAKER." Let us lay aside all personalities, and put into the field the talents, best adapted to the work, without respect of persons, in every community of Believers, until every State is thoroughly canvassed. It is enough for us to know that "THE SHAKER" continues to be ably edited; that its radical truths are working like leaven among the masses; truths, too, which have been (and continue) revolutionizing the world of thought for the last one hundred years.

Why, even the very heathens (so-called) are beginning to rise up in judgment against the false christianity of our day, founded upon Paul instead of Jesus! But they do not conflict with "THE SHAKER," neither past, nor the present. In all ages of the world, truth harmonizes with itself. Principles never change. It is when truth grapples with error that conflict arises.

There is no conflict between the theology of THE SHAKER, the pentecostal church, nor any high standard of morals; and we may say, original christianity, which existed among the Chinese, Japanese, Burmese, and Hindoos, thousands of years before the nations of Europe were known, excepting as barbarians; while our christian era, and, even our bible, are modern when compared with their ancient records. Viewed in the light of truthful, scientific antiquity, they cast us, as Americans, quite into the shades.

No wonder our dear J. M. Peebles felt humiliated, while visiting the oriental nations, when he saw that they not only had records dating anterior to any thing he could find in the western world, but that they had inspirational gifts, too, from the God of the Universe equal to our own.

It is enough for us to know that all our good deeds are recorded in the book of life; that we are in harmony with the good, the true, and the pure of all nations.

SUBDUED PASSION.

MARY WHITCHER.

Passions restrained, but not subdued,
May yet o'errule the whole—
Our common sense, our spirit life—
The body and the soul.

"A word to the wise" being sufficient, may be that our gentle hint, of the necessity of subduing the passions, may help some one. Our experience has proved that indifference to the curbing of the passions puts very far off the day of greatest victory. Our association with the pure and good has not made us good and pure, unless we, like them, have ruled and subdued our passions. Let us work for the most desirable of harvest to the soul; and we will joy in the reward of the wise, who, ruling his own spirit, can sing of triumph over death and the grave. Are we wise? Then we will let no passions dethrone our reason. Are we the subjects of passion? Where can be our reason, our conscience, our hope?

INFLUENCE OF LOVE.

MARIA WITHAM.

As the sun of the natural world warms the flower into life and beauty, so the spirit of man receives from the great fountain of divine love, the warmth which animates it into action. This quickening spirit of love is the essence of our beings; it flows from God into our souls, and forms a part of our lives. If love, then, is the essential principle of our beings, it is very important that we understand its nature and quality. Mankind partake of animal love, but with it we also partake of an inner, spiritual love, which is angelic in its perfection. As all sin comes from love of self, we should seek above all things, that power which lifts us above the realm of self, and its evils, into that heavenly sphere, where love is characterized by purity of word and deed. By the power of this spirit, victory over evil is gained, and the power of the enemy laid low.

Love in purity brings from within itself all that our heavenly parents can bestow. Unto God give all thy thoughts, and in thy actions he shall be glorified, and in his love thou shalt be rewarded. Light and love— the intelligent eye, and kind heart of God—two sisters in holiness, decorate the brow of their sterner brother truth, with heaven's choicest garlands. Love and wisdom smooth the rugged road, and make the sandy desert to bloom as a heavenly resting place for the heaven-bound pilgrim. Without God's love there is no harmony.

SOCIAL BEAUTIES OF SHAKER COMMUNISM.

SARAH A. NEAL.

DEAR EDITOR OF THE SHAKER: Being an earnest reader of THE SHAKER, and feeling a deep interest in its permanent success, I take the liberty to write a few lines, in which I purpose to offer some remarks upon that which would improve, and make it more effective, generally and particularly, while you certainly are at liberty to act your pleasure with the same.

That THE SHAKER is a candid exponent of gospel truth I truly admit; and think every reasonable reader will readily say the same; but while I have read its truths with a very large amount of pleasure, and have enjoyed a real soul-gain by so doing, I regret to observe that the beauties of social life, derived by the practice of these truthful principles, do not find fuller expression in its columns. I sometimes think, that for an exponent of cheerful christianity, THE SHAKER wears too sad a countenance to comport with its true mission. Now, would it not brighten its general appearance, and make it more favorably effective to all, to blend more of our social benefits, with our religious tenets? That the social life of christian communism is superior in its precepts to all worldly life, we know very well; indeed, principles so beautiful as those on which our institution is founded, are calculated to produce a heaven right here upon the earth; and if we fail to realize the superior harmonies of the angel-life, it is because our practical lives fail compliance with these basic principles. Living in the spirit of our gospel testimony, we necessarily renounce many practices which bring pleasure to the worldly mind; and embrace those elements which produce the joys of heaven in our present social lives. And would not individuals, making no profession of our principles, more willingly sacrifice their transient pleasures, for the acceptance of the pure and enduring joys of christian communism, could they know that such were the living realities of our present life, and not alone anticipated hopes to be realized in the far away future?

Now it is commonly believed by those least acquainted with Shaker communism, that the Shakers are a recluse and unhappy people; but so far from this necessarily being the case, we know that our happiness might be transcendent in excess of that realized within the limits of worldly circles. And, knowing this to be a fact, I think we fail to do justice to our gospel cause, by permitting any to think thus wrongly of our social lives, by our remaining silent on this subject. It seems to me that our paper ought to be the very christ of our day—the true medium, through which the divine spirit can reach mankind; and to make it thoroughly loyal to its mission, we need to clothe it throughout with the genial spirit of Christ, that, while it prepares the soil, and sows the seeds of truth in nature's bleak country, it may, at the same time, reflect the warmth of spirit, and the sunshine of power, requisite to bring forth those germs into life and fruitful activity. The fact is simply this: we need to denote more of the bright, genuine influence expressed by "I am happy, I am free." And when we shall have convinced the world that this is our home condition, thus enhancing the beauties of our gospel, more will be attracted to our delightful precincts, to share in the truths and joys of the heavenly kingdom, not anticipated, nor imagined, but real, tangible, present possessions. Then again, if I understand Shaker communism rightly, it not only claims the faculties in their religious exercises, but it embraces every active, practical phase of a pure life; and likewise the all domestic phases, which we nearly or wholly neglect to notice. These form an essential part in the programme of practical christianity. And to neglect one phase of our christian life is to reflect a shadow on all the others. And more, I think that all societies, families, and individuals could be largely benefited by a liberal expression of every christian, domestic practice. Let us give expression to all that is good, whether coming from the basement or attic of domestic relations; and christian duty calls us into both places oftentimes. For instance, some society or family may have easier methods for doing certain kinds of business; others, a more healthy kind of food and a nicer manner of preparing it. Still another may have acquired superior facilities for intellectual improvements; and by giving expression to our various attainments in different departments of domestic life, all could be benefited by adopting the most advanced opinions. Of course these are only suggestions not intended as any intrusion upon that which could occupy their place with more propriety. But to conclude, I think if we clothe our truths with sunshine, and present them with cheerfulness, we shall increase their force, and make their effects eternal. And while I hope the truth may have a perfect growth with us all, and that the smiles of a loving providence may ever brighten the editorial sanctum of THE SHAKER, I remain very truly the friend of beautiful christianity, and your sister.

THINK NO EVIL.

MARIA WHEELER.

THE importance of speaking no evil cannot be too deeply considered. Yet to avoid evil speaking it appears necessary that we think no evil. We are so liable to be led by impulse, that we can hardly entertain evil and unkind thoughts toward any one, and constantly speak good and kind words of them. Some individuals may be very weak and erring, but to such we should extend that "charity which covereth a multitude of sins;" and few if any are so perfect as to be faultless. Again, we may fail to understand, and consequently misinterpret the actions of others. If we practice judging the actions of others, by our preconceived ideas of their motives, we will unjustly, and often injuriously, "bear false witness" of them. Although six thousand years have rolled their slow lengths along since the command, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy brother" was first proclaimed, its justice and immutability have lost none of their force. And it declares its divine origin by its just and equitable character. Nor is it more a commandment than the words of the wise and good man Jesus, written in the sands, "neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more." Our obedience to these two commandments, the former to protect the innocent, and the latter to shelter even the guilty, would give us food for pleasant reflections, when we do as the poet beautifully says:

"It is good to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven,
And how they might have borne more welcome news."

This practice would make us lenient to the faults of others; and often discover to us that much which we are inclined to call wicked in others is only unwisdom. Now, if we wish to speak no evil of any one, we must think no evil, lest unkind thoughts betray themselves through speech. If the heart is right, there is no need of a sentinel at the lips.

FIVE QUESTIONS.—PLEASE ANSWER.

RUTH WEBSTER.

CAN we truly say that we desire the blessing of God, when we do not strive to merit it? Or can we confidently expect His protection when we have neglected to use the means that we have to protect ourselves? Can we expect to crucify the lust of the flesh, while we fail to control our imaginations? Or expect to overcome the lust of the eye, while indulging in the vanities of the world? Can any one follow the first Adam in the works of generation, and be a follower of Christ in the resurrection at the same time?

MUSIC NO. 5. BASSINI'S THEORY.

J. G. RUSSELL.

PHYSICALLY speaking, "tone is breath, made vocal;" therefore, the respiratory process is the great, moving cause of the origin of tone. The thorax, alluded to in the preceding number, is an organ, capable of immense compression, and expansion, which renders it a befitting receptacle for the lungs, and likewise subserves the purpose of giving, by its resonance, both depth and volume to tone. Rising now higher, in the scale of tone-rendering, we trace the movements of expired air, as it leaves the lungs, and enters two great branches, or tubes, anatomically termed the bronchi, at the junction of which is a single tube, called the trachea, which is composed of numerous cartilaginous rings, into which the air passes. Situated on the top of the trachea, is a cartilaginous box, called the larynx, which, in the language of Bassini, "is composed of four pieces, which have the power of playing into each other, or of moving together. Through the center of the larynx is a hollow passage, or continuation of the air-tube. This tube terminates in a wide opening, which is formed by the vocal cords, being of triangular shape, and is called the glottis. Above this opening is a valve, called the epiglottis. The epiglottis covers the air-tube, and protects it in the act of swallowing; the food passing down behind at the back of the throat. Above the epiglottis is a continuation of the opening [leading both into the mouth and the nose] called the pharynx. The walls of the pharynx have the power of contracting, or acting upon, the column of air, thus modifying the tone." The larynx, then, is the principal instrument in the production of vocal sound; and through its mechanical structure we come to consider the nature of the voice. Though writers upon this subject are somewhat at variance in their ideas as regards its likeness to certain kinds of musical instruments, they coincide in the idea that its imitation is good in certain ways. The distinguished Bassini—before alluded to—after recognizing three kinds of musical instrument, viz.: the reed, the stringed, and the flute (all three of which he explains), thus writes, "But I cannot resist the conviction, that the voice is an admirable compound of all three mechanisms; and for this reason: It is not a reed alone, because a voice can slide from one tone to another (like sliding a finger up a violin or guitar string), in a manner impossible to a reed instrument. Besides, in a reed instrument, the reed, or tongue, is fastened at one end only; whereas, the vocal cords, in their perpendicular extension through the larynx, are fastened at both." Again, "The voice is not a stringed instrument alone, because in the production of falsetto tones (so called), the strings cease to vibrate." Still again, "It is not a flute instrument alone, because only a portion of the tones are produced by the vibration of a column of air in a fixed tube. The voice, therefore, I cannot but think, wonderfully combines the advantages of the reed, the string, and the flute mechanism, most closely resembling, however, the reed."

THE DAY OF CHRIST.

WM. H. RUSSELL.

THIS expression is world-wide as well as particular in its signification. Jesus said, "When I shall be elevated from the earth, I will draw all unto myself." "When the son of man shall come in his glory, then will he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations." There is evidently here an allusion to that sublime scene in the vision of the prophet Daniel, when "one like the son of man came to the ancient of days, and there was given him dominion and glory, that all peoples should serve him, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion."

The son of man in the vision is to be regarded only as a representative character, for in the interpretation given to the prophet, it was declared, "The dominion under the whole heaven shall be given to the people—the holy ones of the Most High." That Jesus understood it in this light is evident from his words in the application and exposition of the vision. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

The day of Christ is the day of judgment of all nations and of each individual person. Jesus said, "For judgment I have come into this world," and yet he declared emphatically, "I come not to judge the world, but to save the world." He reconciles these words by the statement, "The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge you in the last day." In this light are to be understood the words of the prophet, "Judgment was given to the saints;" and also of the apostle, "Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world?"

It is truth, or God himself inspiring his people, that is to be the judge of mankind as nations and as individuals. God is unbounded love, perfect holiness, infinite wisdom; the God of all peace and of all justice. These attributes must have irresistible sway. Judged by these, in the progress of this eternal day, the apostolic age of ages, the nations shall yet be impelled to convert their instruments of destruction into implements of peace; not only to abandon all efforts to acquire fame by conquest and slaughter, but also to change all the customs of servitude, whether of man to man, or woman to man; all the distinctions of wealth, all the marks of honor that arise not from the indwelling of the spirit of love and exact justice in the soul; and to employ the abundant resources which the earth contains for the highest welfare of all its children. This is the universal prophecy that has come hymning its joyous melody all along the ages, uplifting many a heart that seemed overwhelmed by the accumulated evils of its own times.

This truth must also judge the individual. When divine love makes its permanent residence in the soul, it will sit in judgment upon every thing found there contrary to itself. It must decide against that pride which exalts itself not only against God, but against the least of his creatures. It must condemn to the perpetual fire of the day of judgment that self-conceit of the individual man which influences him to regard himself as occupying the place of Supreme Authority, ready to exercise vengeance against whoever ventures to call in question his infallibility. It inculcates humility; not a bowing and cringing before power, whether legitimate or assumed, but that evenness of soul which puts itself on a level with all God's creatures because they are such. Divine love must decide against whatever disturbs the equanimity of the soul, producing a condition such that it cannot weigh in even scales whatever is presented to its rational powers. It impresses upon the understanding and the conscience the truth, that fickle lust is not love, and that mere indulgence in any or all of the senses and passions does not tend to the highest welfare. The power of judgment is a discriminating power; it examines all motives, and scrutinizes all feelings, approving whatever will permanently edify, and discarding that which is valueless.

As a necessary sequence of the preceding, the day of Christ must be regarded, as it is in reality, a day of resurrection from evil of every kind, and an entrance upon a new life, vastly superior to that which is merely sensuous, even in its highest condition. The sensuous man may be highly developed, socially, intellectually, and morally. When he has risen from the sensuous to the spiritual plane of life, he is no less social, intellectual, or moral; the obligations to universal culture and growth are binding as ever. The difference between the two conditions consists in degree as well as in tendency. There is in the latter a newness in the sensations experienced, and an aspiration toward that Divine Life, which comprehends every creature of God in its loving embrace. In his former condition, the person is limited in his social, intellectual and moral vision, and hence is often sceptical with respect to immortality, even though he may have made extraordinary scientific attainments. The newness of life experienced enlarges his views and imbues his spirit with a consciousness of immortality that mere intellectualism cannot supply. This inspires him with courage in the work of restraint which he finds necessary in order to rise entirely above the sensuous, and to live and move in the spiritual life. This experience, with the added fact that it is ultimately to be the experience of every human being, and that it is never to end, but to increase as the ages ceaselessly roll on, is what really makes the glory of the day of Christ.

COMMUNICATION FROM HORACE GREELEY.

THROUGH ALMIRA ALLARD.

[It is generally known that the Shakers are the original subjects of modern spiritualism. We have received innumerable communications from the Spirit World, many being accompanied by irrefragable evidences of genuineness. Although these seasons, in their most fluent proportions, have ceased with us, passing out to the larger human societies of families, yet we have never been entirely neglected by our spirit friends. We present the following communications from the simple, loved, good, and great GREELEY. It is but just to the medium that we say, the same was sent to us, before the Belknap and other exposures were made. (G. A. LOMAS.)

To G. A. LOMAS, ED. OF THE SHAKER:

* * * I still live, and work for the good of humanity. I find in the spirit world, that while the sexes stand on an equality in all things, the masculine principle precedes in the direction of the general good. Laws are made here, through the united agencies of male and female mind. They are not arbitrarily imposed on any. The influence of love they bear with them, invites their acceptance, and convinces the erring and fallen, that their good only is desired. The golden rule is more apparent here than on earth; and hence, we find here none trodden down, nor ruled by the iron rod of tyranny. * * * I perceive in the government of Washington, corrupt and evil men; those upon whom the president should look with unfavorable eyes. The elements that waken the spirit of war, are warning up again, and for the most selfish ends, there are those in governmental positions who favor war. Let these be chastened.

* * * When on earth, I labored honestly for human elevation. I believed in a just God, and in retributive consequences. In my way, and according to my ability, I did uplift the people. I was not considered a Washington, Jackson, nor as others, noted for peculiarly noble deeds; I was, and am, simply Horace Greeley. Here, I can see the folly of worldly splendor: Noblemen and kings; ladies and their queens, anxiously accepting offers of mercy from the humble, in ways that are lowly, yet wise; all guided by the Christ-spirit. I am now confirmed, that I was correct in my private opinions of the extent of intercommunications between this spirit world and earth. * * *

Be thou encouraged! THE SHAKER is earnestly sought by thousands in these spheres; and it has already been the best means of enlightening innumerable minds in spirit life. It is destined to have a wider circulation. I find my inclinations lead me as strongly to work through the press of this and your world as ever, and as your companion, expect more from me. HORACE GREELEY.

DEAR EDITOR—You were so kind to insert the little poem "Speak no Ill," by request of Sister Samantha Bowie, that I make bold to ask a similar favor. I think highly of the above, and deem this one a proper companion.

Your Brother,
DANIEL SIZER.

SPEAK NOT TO HIM A BITTER WORD.

—o—
"Would'st thou a wanderer reclaim,
A wild and restless spirit tame—
Check the warm glow of youthful blood,
And lead a lost one back to God;
Pause, if thy spirit's wrath be stirred;
Speak not to him a bitter word.
Speak not—that bitter word may be
The stamp that seals his destiny.

"If widely he has gone astray,
And dark excess has marked his way,
'Tis pitiful—but yet beware,
Reform must come from kindly care.
Forbid thy parting lips, to move
But in the gentle tones of love.
Though sadly his young heart hath erred,
Speak not to him a bitter word.

"The lowering frown he will not bear,
Thy venom'd chidings will not hear,
The ardent spirit, will not brook
The stinging tooth of sharp rebuke.
Thou would'st not goad the restless steed,
To calm his fire or check his speed—
Then let no angry words be heard—
Speak not to him a bitter word.

"Go kindly to him—make him feel
Your heart yearns deeply for his weal.
Tell him the dangers thick, that lay
Around his widely devious way,—
So shalt thou win him, call him back,
From pleasure's smooth, seductive track,
And warnings, thou hast mildly given,
May guide the wanderer up to heaven."

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

JESUS AS A LAWYER.

A PERSONAL friend of ours, has for a very long time been the unfortunate victim of grave accusations, and that these may be proven facts, abundant opportunity is being consumed, before courts, councils, committees, and the general world of thinking men and women. They may prove to be mere scandal; they may prove truths, which "the mills of the gods," so slowly, yet inevitably present. But in all the trials thus far, there has been an element wanting, which, being prevalent in Jesus, made him the best of lawyers—preëminently the most desirable one upon such trying occasions.

The majority of the people has adjudged Beecher guilty. There are the best of evidences for believing that this verdict reflects the construction of too many guilty hearts. We have not come forward at this late hour, to be the champion of our illustrious friend, we will not even assert his innocence, though we must be permitted to hope so, but we have risen to interpose the argument of Jesus in his behalf, even supposing his case to wear the worst possible construction. Our impressions are, that these trials have been conceived, opened, prosecuted and attended, by a class resembling one of old, which introduced an equally aggravating case to the attention of Jesus, and at the conclusion of which he figured conspicuously. A scene: A party of two—man and woman—are detected in a very wrong act, for the punishment of which the law of Moses had prescribed stoning to death. The woman only is brought before Jesus, to test the competency of his judgment concerning the law. His answer is well known; and there were no stones cast. Still they questioned Jesus, what they should do with her; while he, stooped to the ground, and as if he heard them not, wrote with his finger thereon, and the revelation of the spirit, says that he wrote: "Ye have all done likewise." A

Jesus was needed in these terrible trials of our friend, to have given a quidus at the first, of causes which have cast such baneful influences all over the world. Our opinion is: If Jesus had conducted Beecher's defense, he would not have shielded him if guilty; but he would have spoken and written as once before, for the benefit of Beecher's accusers, "and they being convicted of their own consciences, went out" leaving Jesus and Beecher alone; and, assured by Beecher's honest confession, of his true condition, the ever memorable index to true repentance might have been useful: "Go, AND SIN NO MORE," while Brooklyn, and all else, could profitably lament:

"Alas, for the rarity of christian charity,
Under the sun."

We all may conclude, that in being weighed in the balance of eternal justice, none will weigh the more in righteousness, for traducing Beecher's or any other's character. Let Jesus be admitted to practice in our own courts. ☆

ORIGINAL AND MODERN CHRISTIANITY.

—o—
THE N. Y. Sun of April 7th, presented in a leading editorial upon "Daniel Drew as a Speculator and Theologian," some of the best of hints upon ancient and modern Christianity. We transfer them to our columns with great pleasure, and hope tens of thousands will transfer them from our columns, into the treasury of their hearts, from whence, we hope, there shall evolve a more genuine and practical Christianity. The question of "Labor vs. Capital" is up for settlement; let it be settled upon the eternal basis of the early, pentecostal, communistic relations. Then we shall have no rich, none poor, all will be brethren. There will be observed through the following, a twinkling of mirth, the better illustrating the scintillations of the grand truth of universal brotherhood: ☆

* * * "The demands of a growing civilization have greatly modified Christianity since it was first preached in Galilee, and the eye of the needle has in the course of twenty centuries been gradually enlarged so as to admit the biggest camel of the herd. It is plain that if we make it a dubious matter whether rich men get into heaven, we discourage trade and set up a bar against the cultivation of the useful desire for riches.

* * * "But is it not a little strange that the (Drew's) theological plant has grown in such a soil? Does it not furnish food for reflection? Give all thou hast to the poor and follow me, was the injunction of the Nazarene. He taught that gold was not a salve for a sore conscience or a pavement for the narrow way to heaven. Such healing must be won by the abandonment of the sordid practices by which the gold was gained, not merely by the relinquishment of the whole or a part of the plunder, and that road must be trod by wayfarers who not only gave up what they had wrested through cupidity, but who also eschewed cupidity itself and followed the lead of a higher and more spiritual guide. If we people of New York should practically take the words of Christ as our guide and follow the example of the chosen companions of his earthly career whom he commended, or even that of the early Christian community who had all things in common, we should have a very different civilization from that we now boast of.

"It is idle to deny that the seed planted in Judea has grown into a tree whose outspreading branches shade and shelter a much more complex system, and one more adjustable to the desires and passions of men than the simple Christianity of the New Testament. This it is which makes the work of preachers and evangelists such up-hill labor. But the great doctrines of the brotherhood of man, and that each must share his brother's burdens, that the unvarying moral law punishes evil doing and rewards righteous doing, that man must work to fulfill a use, not to secure selfish gain only, that duty and not pleasure shall rule men's lives, that immortality is the privilege of man, and that God is one—the essential teachings of Christ—are as resonant in men's ears to-day as when first they were uttered in Galilee."

WHAT CHEER?

This is the centennial year of our country; and by many deemed the same of the introduction of Shaker principles into American atmospheres. While America will, filled with an emulation worthy of much expression, do its utmost to display what one hundred years has done for it as a nation, we as religious contemporaries, should not be behind in giving the largest illustration of what gospel principles, introduced by ANN LEE, have, in the same length of time, done for the elevation and salvation of human souls. Weighed in the balance of worth, a single soul is more precious in God's sight than many Americas! But, how valuable the boon to be in possession of a liberty which permits us to be just as good, pure, peaceable, unworldly and philanthropic as we choose, without the least dread of violating the laws of the country in which we reside. Of no other country can we say as much.

Blest thus, what lies in the way of our rendering to the world at large, the most cheering illustrations of pure possibilities, and of making effective the attractions of a cheerful christianity? Brethern and Sisters, what have we, individually and collectively, to offer as cheer to way-faring, sin-sick humanity? Let us revive, and let not our centennial pass without giving the largest of evidences that we have, in very active operation, principles that save us from our sins, and from the desire to sin—principles that have changed our hearts, from worldly, flesh-loving, self-gratifying individuals, into a truth-loving, truth-living brotherhood—pentecostal practitioners in all christian life. "What cheer?" "Salvation in deed?" "What inducements to the weary and heavy laden?" "Rest?" "What cheer?" "Do you love Shaker life better than all worldly life?" "Do you take more comfort in its practice than in 'all the world besides?'" "Does it make you cheerful, kind, peaceful and restful?" If it is to us "the pearl of great price," "the only way"—the grandest panacea for unsaved humanity—and unless it is, we are hypocrites—let us be up and doing, daily answering "what cheer?" ☆

CONVICTION AND CONVERSION.

PLEASED beyond expression that "the angel is troubling the waters," and that so many have heard the invitation to step in and be healed, we are moved to communicate upon the grand desiderata of the times. We are witnesses of a valuable truth—that whoso loves men's souls may, by earnest, persistent efforts, induce the impression that results in a revival of the Good Spirit among men. There is none, however, in the past nor present, who, having awakened souls to the realization of their loss, and the necessity of their conversion, but is confronted with the truth that human effort alone is very, very limited for human salvation—only an agent in the hands of higher powers. We have heard the egotist boast of what he has done and what he can do, but these have been made intensely disagreeable by the prayer of the humble, "Lord, if Thou wilt, and unless Thou dost help, mine is a useless effort!" We have read of and witnessed the arduous efforts of sincere soul-workers, we have noted their personal endeavors in mentally convicting individuals of their souls' real needs, and we have seen sinners aroused, as by thunder-claps, through the efforts of the successful revivalist. We have been mournful witnesses also, of the serious truth that conviction, though it necessarily precedes, is not conversion. We have been among the number who have earnestly labored in diffusing the light that exposes human errors, and we have been as sorrowfully disappointed at the ease with which those who, having experienced true conviction, failed to yield to a genuine conversion, and that there followed in the wake of great awakenings of the good spirit, an army of backsliders into the mire and vomit of worldly pride and flesh.

To the thousands who may feel the spirit working for them, THE SHAKER speaks cheerfully, adding an assurance, however, that if a "change of heart" means any thing, it means turning from sinful practice into the righteousness of a new, unselfish, pure Christian life.

A revival that begins in the spirit and ends in the flesh is soul-hardening—there better have been no revival. And yet, how frequently, almost invariably, revivals take this unchristian turn. Why is it that carnal affiliations of a general character subsequently displace the pure affections of the good spirit that, in times of genuine revival, lifts souls upon the cross that crucified Jesus every day of his life—that makes the bare mention of worldly pride and carnal lusts the most objectionable themes? Seek conviction, but be assured of a true conversion, without which all effort is useless and all religion a fraud. ☆

RELIGIOUS TEST.

"It might with truth be said that there are a thousand different religions in the world; but as to their 'equality' in the sight of God, each will judge for himself. "By their fruits ye shall know them." That religion which develops the whole human being, enlightens the intellect, sanctifies the social feelings, and makes every man accountable for himself to his God; that makes him a self-governing, self-regulating, and self-sustaining human being; that emancipates him from superstition, and from self-indulgence, comes nearest to the requirement as we understand it."

To hear the discourse of wise men delights us, and their company inspires us with noble contemplations.

Never, when you see a thing to be right, stand shaking and quaking, and say: "But then." That "but then" is a devil damned. If and but have destroyed more souls than any other fiend in hell.

THE BY AND BY.

—O—
E. T. LEGGETT.

What glowing hopes await the by and by
Whose mystic shadows fall across our way;
That star of promise in the dreamland sky
Toward which our hearts go upward night and day.
How good we'll be, and happy, by and by;
How easy to be good, when all below
To "Paradise Restored," and all on high
A fountain, from which living waters flow.

When youth's hot blood thrills through our veins
no more;
And hearts beat but to music of the spheres;
Grace shall the bloom of innocence restore,
And faith and smiles supplant our doubts and tears.
But when that bright to-morrow of our prayer,
Shall, with its fortunes, to the past belong,
How many treasured hopes, then buried there,
Shall form the burden of our future song.

The cloud-capped mountains that afar off glow,
Like golden islands in some distant sphere,
When magic lifts the veil, but fields of snow
And jagged peaks, 'mid frozen wastes appear.
Thus distance paints, with colors all its own,
Each rugged wild of nature's solitude;
And builds a heaven in each misty zone
Where love ne'er tempted angel to intrude.

The golden hours, the seasons as they roll,
Are richly stored with happiness and love,
To build an Eden in each living soul,
And consecrate it to the courts above.
But make the present bright, the future then
No fancy ever pictured half so fair;
Then hope shall fold her wearied wings again,
And, back to earth, find her true heaven there.

KEEP.

Keep to the right as the law directs,
Keep from the world thy friend's defect,
Keep all thy thoughts on purest themes,
Keep from thine eyes the motes and beams;
Keep true thy deed, thy honor bright,
Keep firm thy faith in God and right,
Keep free from any sin and stain,
Keep from the ways that bring the pain;
Keep free thy tongue from words of ill,
Keep right thy aim and good thy will;
Keep all thy acts from passion free,
Keep strong in hope, no envy see;
Keep watchful care o'er tongue and hand,
Keep free thy feet, by justice stand;
Keep true thy word, a sacred thing,
Keep from the snares the tempters bring;
Keep faith with each you call a friend,
Keep full in view the final end;
Keep love between thy God and thee,
Keep from all hate and malice free,
Keep firm thy courage bold and strong,
Keep up the right and down the wrong;
Keep well the words of wisdom's school,
Keep warm by night and by day keep cool.

TRUTH.

—O—
ROBERT AIKEN.

WHAT is it? I answer, the glory of time, and the daughter of eternity. A title of the highest grace and a part of divine nature. It is the life of religion—the light of love—the grace of wit—and the crown of wisdom. It is the beauty of valor, the brightness of honor, and the joy of earth. Her nature is pure gold, her time is right precious, her words most glorious, and her essence is God. His wisdom and her words redound to glory. Truth is honored in constancy, admired in patience, and beloved in charity. She hath a pure eye, and a plain hand; a piercing thought, and a perfect heart. She is wisdom in the way of holiness and taketh her rest in the resolution of goodness. Her church is without schism, her city without fraud, and her kingdom without vice. It is the perfection of nature, where God in Christ shows the glory of Christianity.

PARTON'S APOLOGY.

MR. PARTON'S article on the "Caricatures of the Reformation" furnishes a lively illustration of the droll humors of that period, and of the characters of the leading actors in the scene which found its denouement in the establishment of Protestantism. Apropos of a picture representing Calvin at the burning of Servetus, Mr. Parton offers a good-natured apology for the part taken by the illustrious Genevan divine in that unhappy transaction:

The former was not indeed present at the burning, but he caused the arrest of the victim, drew up the charges, furnished part of the testimony that convicted him, consented to and approved his execution. Servetus was a Spanish physician, of blameless life and warm convictions, who rejected the doctrine of the Trinity. Catholic and Protestant equally abhorred him, and Protestant Geneva seized the opportunity to show the world its attachment to the true faith by burning a man whom Rome was also burning to burn. It was a hideous scene—a virtuous and devoted Unitarian expiring in the flames after enduring the extremest anguish for thirty minutes, and crying, from the depths of his torment, "Jesus, thou Son of the eternal God, have mercy on me!" But it was not Calvin who burned him. It was the century. It was imperfectly developed human nature. Man had not reached the civilization which admits, allows, welcomes, and honors disinterested conviction. It were as unjust to blame Calvin for burning Servetus as it is to hold the Roman Catholic Church of the present day responsible for the Inquisition of three centuries ago. It was Man that was guilty of all those stupid and abominable cruelties. Luther, the man of his period, honestly declared that if he were the Lord God, and saw kings, princes, bishops, and judges so little mindful of his Son, he would "knock the world to pieces." If Calvin had not burned Servetus, Servetus might have burned Calvin, and the Pope would have been happy to burn both.

CRACKED WHEAT PUDDING.

NANNIE MINOR.

[From the Country Gentleman.]

SOME one has asked for directions as to the various modes of cooking cracked wheat; but among the numerous replies I have not seen one for making a dish which our family consider particularly dainty and wholesome. I take a large coffee-cupful of boiled cracked wheat; four eggs; four heaping tablespoonsful of coffee-sugar; one pint of new milk; one piece of butter of the size of a walnut, and one fresh lemon (if I can get it). Mash the wheat with the potato masher (to avoid lumps); add the yolks of the eggs and sugar well beaten together; the butter after it is melted, then the milk, and lastly, three or four slices of the lemon, being careful not to allow the seeds in, as they will make it bitter. Bake one-half hour or until the custard is set, stirring once or twice after it becomes heated, to prevent the wheat from settling to the bottom. Beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth; add a little pulverized sugar, and flavor with the juice of the lemon that is left. When the pudding is baked spread this on the top, return to the oven and brown lightly; serve hot, with cream, or it is equally good when cold. Cracked wheat simply boiled is a daily dish on our breakfast table, and as it is almost impossible to cook just enough, we often have a small saucerful left. In two or three days enough will have accumulated to make this pudding—and to use these precious bits I have improvised this, which has now come to be one of our standard puddings, and which I now offer to your readers in return for the many practical hints I have received through the columns of your valuable paper.

SPIRIT OF THE FARM.

TOMATOES VERSUS INSECTS.—A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker says: "Set a tomato plant into each hill of cucumbers, melons and squashes, and you will have no trouble from the striped bugs that are so destructive to these plants. The plants can be tied to stakes, and if well pruned when large both subjects can proceed with their fruiting without detriment to one another."

THE London Builder recommends people who transplant trees to mark the north side of each tree with red chalk before it is taken up, and replace it in its natural position. A larger proportion will then live, as, in ignoring this law of Nature, transplanted trees commonly perish.

A FEW "Greeley Mohawk" grape cuttings yet to spare—the best early grape now in the market—each subscriber to THE SHAKER sending postage, is entitled to one; or send 20 cents to the editor for two. Shakers P. O., N. Y.

THE ONION MAGGOT, says the New England Farmer, may be out-generated by planting the seed as deeply, as consistent to insure growth. It gets to be too tough for the maggots' teeth when reaching the surface.

GENUINE SHAKER APPLE SAUCE.—Is made of sweet, dried apples and boiled cider. Reduce the cider, by boiling, one-half, when it first comes from the press skimming frequently. This may be set away, in wood, for any length of time in safety. In proportion of 25 pounds of apples, soak in 30 qts. of cider, 20 qts. of water, until fully swelled. When ready to make, add 25 qts. of the cider, and boil until tender. A few dried quinces improves its flavor.

SARAH A. VAN WYCK.

EXPULSION OF FLIES.

WE copy the following from the London Garden. Have any of our readers witnessed similar results?

The Rev. George Meares Drought, writing from Ireland to the Times, says: "For three years I have lived in a town, and during that time my sitting-room has been free from flies, three or four only walking about my breakfast-table, while all my neighbors' rooms were crowded. I often congratulated myself on my escape, but never knew the reason of it until two days ago. I then had occasion to move my goods to another house, while I remained on for two days longer. Among other things removed were two boxes of Geraniums and Calceolarias, which stood in my window, the windows being always open to the full extent, top and bottom. The boxes were not gone half-an-hour before my room was as full of flies as those around me. This, to me, is a new discovery, and perhaps it may serve to encourage others in that which is always a source of pleasure, and which now proves also to be a source of comfort, viz., window gardening."

A NEW SOCIALISTIC INSTITUTION IN VERMONT.

[From the Manufacturer and Builder.]

WILL IT WORK?—A number of young persons in Springfield, Vt., have associated themselves on a plan based upon principles much further reaching than the so often tried and unsuccessful co-operative plan, but based somewhat on the socialistic principle, though so modified as to secure its success, by keeping out lazy and selfish individuals.

They have established an institution which they call the Industrial Works, and this establishment furnishes all the members with constant employment at fair wages, and a pleasant home at a small cost, which is meeting with a success so marked as to attract the attention of all thinking people. The members of this association are all young people, who are willing to rid themselves of all bad habits, work steadily, dress economically, and save a portion of their wages; no others are taken. All the men who join are required to furnish a small amount of capital, and to save one-fourth of their wages, which must be invested in the capital stock of the association. Women are not required to furnish any capital at the outset, but must save one-sixth of their wages and invest it in the business. Those who do not comply with the requirements of the association are expelled, and those who wish to leave can do so at any time, and can withdraw their capital by giving six months' notice. The wages paid to each member are fixed by a Board of Directors, and are proportioned to their skill and ability. They have a large dwelling, or home, where the members live and enjoy many privileges and comforts not usually found in families or boarding-houses. All pay a moderate price for their board from their wages. They have two new factory buildings, a good water privilege and considerable machinery, and are engaged in the manufacture of toy and house-furnishing goods, for which they find a ready sale. They commenced business a year ago with five hands, and are now working forty-five; their sales for last month were over $3,000, their pay-roll for the month was over $1,200, and the saving of wages which was added to the capital of the company was over $300. The average amount saved from the wages of each man in a year is $150, and of each woman $50. Many of the members have saved much more than this during the year, but this is all that is required of them. The aggregate amount saved by the present company in a year will be nearly $5,000.

SLUMBERING PLANTS.

IT is well known that plants sleep at night; but their hours of sleeping are a matter of habit, and may be disturbed artificially, just as a cock may be waked up to crow at untimely hours by the light of a lantern. A French chemist subjected a Sensitive Plant to an exceedingly trying course of discipline, by completely changing its hours—exposing it to a bright light at night, so as to prevent sleep, and putting it in a dark room during the day. The plant appeared to be much puzzled and disturbed at first. It opened and closed its leaves irregularly, sometimes nodding, in spite of the artificial sun that shed its beams at midnight, and sometimes waking up, from the force of habit, to find the chamber dark in spite of the time of day. Such are the trammels of use and wont. But, after an obvious struggle, the plant submitted to the change, and turned day into night, without any apparent ill effects.

ACCORDING TO BEECHER.

ANOTHER man finds himself a lawyer. He is not at all adapted to this profession. He is an upright and honest and good man, and yet it so happens that that is his occupation.

Men have despised the body too much, but after all, when God made the body, he knew what he was about.

You have no more right to overtax yourself than you have to overtax your horse. A merciful man is merciful to his beast—to his own body.

What a shame that it should be left for war—to illustrate what ought to have been illustrated by the church!

A good Christian needs to be born again, but it is very necessary that he should have been well born when he was first born.

I think that he is the best man who has the most boy in him.

You will never need for a corrupt minister. There is a church for hell as well as for the sanctities.

HOW DOES THE WORLD MOVE?

—Capital punishment has been abandoned in Maine. What is good for Maine is good for New York.

—Public whipping of wife-beaters has been adopted by the State of California—if this works well there, will it not become a United States' practice?

—What can vegetarians think of the Kentucky shower of flesh!

—Vermont has not a single woman as prisoner in her State prison.

—Materializations of spirits are having their ups and downs with the people. Their reality is still far ahead.

—The State Senate of California has abolished the office of Chaplain. All hail the omen!

—Ex-Gov. Dix of New York, in his foggy opposition to the proposition of taxing church property, foolishly says, that "it is taxing the worship of Almighty God!" Jesus told a larger truth in the closing of verse 13, Matt. 21.

—Another lesson from China: When a bank fails in China, the officers' heads accompany the assets! The last failure took place five hundred years ago.

—Is it probable, as reports infer, that Congress is sufficiently honest to deny the further extension of sewing machine patents?

—In Egypt, the Custom House is closed on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, in considerations of the Mohammedan, Jewish and Christian religions. ☆

Canterbury and Enfield, N. H., have been having a wonderful flow of the milk of maple. Of this they make a superior syrup, genuine, unadulterated, eleven pounds to the gallon. Friends, do you want some? Send orders to Henry Cummings, Enfield, N. H. $1.25 per gallon.

If San Francisco has any right to prevent the immigration of Chinese, have not New York and other ports a similar right to object to any nationality toward whom prejudice may arise? Where's Columbia? ☆

Dying to a lofty spirit,
Over-bearing, proud and high,
Stooping not with gentle pity,
When the lowly passeth by.
Dying unto false pretenses,
Held in pure Religion's name,
Cant, hypocrisy and grandeur—
Silken robes for sin and shame.

Dying, that in resurrection,
Grand and true the soul may rise,
Noble types of God-like image
Wrought through perfect sacrifice.
Life is in the Christian's triumph,
When from sin and bondage free,
Lo, the prince of darkness cometh,
And can find no place in me.

OUR BOOK TABLE.

THIRTY DISCUSSIONS: D. M. Bennett, 335 Broadway, N. Y. In this volume, we have collated many of the most brilliant truths evolved by the nineteenth century. The subjects discussed embrace the most prominent of Bible errors. To those who believe the entire Bible to be the word of God—plenary inspiration—we advise them to let this valuable book alone, unless they are prepared to accept the truth at the expense of such belief. Let those who dare love and read the truth, send and get Thirty Discussions by all means.

TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS: The Same. We have been delighted with the reading of these living utterances of so many champions of truth. Their authors are numerous. The unsparing zeal exercised by them in enunciating the gospel of truth, as opposed to priestcraft, etc., is very worthy of imitation; and the best way to begin the imitation is to send for these leaflets, loose, or bound in neat, tasty volumes. Write the publisher—a most genial man—and we almost suspect you will get a copy of the "Truth Seeker" in return, containing catalogue of these valuable, and error-killing tracts. Be benevolent, be noble; do by him, as by the best friend of humanity.

THE WORLD'S SIXTEEN CRUCIFIED SAVIOURS: Colby & Rich, Publishers, Boston, Mass. So much has been written of this book, that to say very extravagant things of it, would only be repetition and superfluous. We perceive that some of our Shaker fraternity have been complimenting it very highly through the press variously. As a work of deep thought, and sincere devotion of what is right, it will find few equals, and very few superiors. We do not see how such a book can fail of receiving a very thorough perusal and digestion; and as a consequence, there will have been added to the army of truth-finders, a host of infidels to an extensive, erroneous system of theology, which hides the prominence of a great christianity, prior to Jesus. Every library is incomplete unless this book is there. Order of us, or the publishers, post-paid, $2.20.

THE AMERICAN SOCIALIST: Oneida, N. Y. Weekly. This new weekly replaces the Circular, so long and successfully published by the Communists of Oneida. It presents a very beautiful appearance, has a very pleasant form—same as New Age and Scientific American—and is replete with matter that will interest and instruct all having community tendencies. Whatever we as Shakers may think of the social life at O. C.—and we have partaken largely of the popular prejudice against them—we are forced to accord to them a wisdom in communistic arrangements, other than the social, honesty in manufactures, and a peaceable uprightness in their dealings with those not of their body, that are worthy of our competition. We may have occasion to often refer to the Socialist; and expecting that it will become a large power in our land, wish it only God speed. Subscription, $2.00.

THE COTTAGE HEARTH: Milliken & Spencer, Boston, Mass. We were surprised at reading not long ago, that three-fifths of all periodicals published in the entire world are issued from the American press. Whoever should be so fortunate, as to get hold of a copy of the above monthly, will find a collation of miscellany, music and recipes, that have been chosen with the most exceeding care. As a secular magazine, we have not seen any thing higher toned, nor more desirable; and we now wonder less that America leads the world.

SOCIETY RECORD.

The material for the new "Ministry's Shop" at Mt. Lebanon is on the ground awaiting the clemency of the weather. It will be of brick; 32 feet wide, 38 feet long, with an L for outbuildings. Two stories high,—retiring rooms above. It is the present intention to light and heat it by same reservoirs that warm and illuminate the new house. Its location is fifteen feet farther north; six feet farther west than the previous one—this change for the better prospect, and to escape the shade made by the house.

The Church Family, Mt. Lebanon, purpose exhibiting some of their manufactures at the Centennial. Also, the South Family have secured space to display their Shaker Chairs—editorial, and others, we suppose! We have thought it a good idea, that they should take with them Mother Ann Lee's chair, now in possession—what there is left of it—of Shakers at Watervliet, N. Y. It has been so constantly used, that the legs are worn up to the lower rounds, all round. We were pleased to notice that Bro. R. M. Wagan has issued a musical and historical circular of Shakerism for Centennial circulation; and has so ingeniously blended chairs, music and history together therein, that the people cannot see the pictures of chairs, without being forced to learn our history and our songs! Will not all other Trustees be as anxious to dispense the gospel? We doubt not, that while he thus magnanimously circulates such valuable information, he will also sell many of his chairs!

Elder F. W. Evans has been laboring in New York and Brooklyn considerably of late. Accompanied by ten of his family, songs and sermons were plentifully distributed. We hope they were successful. There is no criterion equal to success.

VITAL TRUTHS.

Truth is like a torch; the more it is shaken, the more it shines.

No indulgence of passion destroys the spiritual nature so much as respectable selfishness.

If we get knowledge into our minds edgewise, it will soon find room to turn.

He who would reprove the world must be one whom the world cannot reprove.

He who reigns within himself, and rules his passions, desires, and fears, is more than a king.

Good humor is the blue sky of the soul, in which every star of talent will shine more clearly.

Traits of character which you seek to conceal, you had much better seek to reform.

The poorest education that teaches one self-control, is better than the best that neglects it.

It is not enough that we swallow truth; we must feed upon it as the insects do upon the leaf, till the whole heart is colored by its qualities, and shows its food in every fibre.

If you put a hot coal in your pocket it will burn its way out. Aye, and so will a bad deed that is hidden make itself known. A fault concealed is a fault doubled; and so you will find all through life. Never hide your faults, but confess them, and seek through God's help to overcome them.

Herbert Spencer says, "Whoever hesitates to utter that which he thinks the highest truth, lest it should be too much in advance of the time, may reassure himself by looking at his acts from an impersonal point of view. Let him duly realize the fact that opinion is the agency through which character adapts external arrangements to itself—that his opinion rightly forms part of this agency—is a unit of force, part of the general power which works out social changes; and he will perceive that he may properly give full utterance to his innermost conviction, leaving it to produce what effect it may. He must remember that, while he is a descendant of the past, he is a parent of the future; and that his thoughts are children which he may not carelessly let die. The highest truth he sees he will fearlessly utter, knowing that whatever may come of it, he is thus playing his right part in the world."

OUR BROTHER'S KEEPER.

—O—
ELDER WILLIAM REYNOLDS.

EDITOR OF THE SHAKER: Through the kindness of Elder H. B. Bear, I was favored with the perusal of THE SHAKER containing your article on "THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE RICH." The entire number is a credit to both publisher and editor. Upon reading it, I was led to ask myself: What is to become of the poor, if the rich fail to use their superior abilities in their behalf? There certainly is something very wrong about the present workings of our civilization.

Riding, a few days since, with one of our moneyed men of Ohio, I was distressed at hearing him groan over the depreciation of various stocks in which he had interests. I opened upon him, by frankly telling him, that we questioned his right to use his fine abilities for such peculiarly selfish ends—to acquire wealth at the expense of his neighbor's rights. "You have money to loan," said I, "your neighbor is in need, and borrows of you at a high rate of interest, hoping, positively expecting, when crops are gathered, to have plenty, to return principal, interest, and a surplus. The season proves a failure to crops; taxes, interest and principal are all due; family expenses must be met; and to meet these, the homestead is sold, and you bid it in, thus absorbing the rights of your neighbor—they become legally yours. And thus you have become owner of many estates, and are a wealthy man. However legal all these transactions may be, are they right, when viewed by the light of the laws of God and human philanthropy? Because the superior organization of your brain has fitted you to outgeneral your neighbor's calculations, have you any right to deprive him thus? and must not a man be more than a common christian who can have other than hate for one, who, in his extremity, took such legal, but ungodly advantage of him?

"But you have the law to uphold you. And this law will punish the original owner as a thief, who dares take an armful of wood from what you own! Where shall we find justice in this?

"I say it is a settled question with me, that you have no right to use your noble abilities, in grasping thus for selfish purposes, and at others' expense. Frugal as are the Shakers, they with difficulty make their financial ends meet in these fearful times; and where some of our financiers have broken sacred laws, forbidding the contracting of debts, they are not able to pay the interest on those debts, and keep their families in the decent order which God's people should live; but "pinch, pinch, PINCH," seems to be the order of their day, until the producers seem unwilling to bear such oppressions from the oppressors."

BE NOBLE, YOUNG PEOPLE.

—O—
SARAH L. SAWYER.

IN your walks in life, you will see many who may appear singular, or have some peculiarity of form; never appear to notice such defect, or let the parties know by looks or words, that you observe it; but treat such with kindness and politeness, especially the aged; treat them with respect, showing them, by kindly acts and helping hand, that they are appreciated. If we treat others with politeness, we may, with reason, expect to be treated with the same consideration in our declining years. And, indeed, we should never withhold a kindly word or act, that would brighten the life of any one; but deny that which would create unpleasantness and sorrow. By so doing we shall enjoy a happiness in the joy of others, that will be an agreeable compensation for all the pains we may take to make others happy. Let ours be ever, to love, and be loved.

LET YOUR LIGHT SHINE.

—O—
HENRY C. BLINN.

BEGIN to-day. No matter how feeble the light, let it shine as best it may. The world may need just that quality of light which you have. Illuminate your whole house with every faculty of the mind, and do some little good in the world before you die. It is foolish to squander time in the vain search for the best place, hoping to be approbated twice for every thing that you may do. Trim your lamp; it may be small; never mind, it is no less a lamp. It may give a flickering light. If used in its best capacity, you need have no fears. Should it stand in contrast with larger lights, it may be no less valuable. Too much light is, at times, an objectionable feature. Yours may be the best in many cases.

Jesus says of his disciples,—"Ye are the light of the world," and advises them to let their light shine. Shall his followers to day do less? It seems that there was an inclination to hide the light under a bushel, or rather to live selfishly. Is there such an inclination among any order of christians to-day?

It was an injudicious course in that day, and is no less so in the present. Give to God the best that you have for the redemption of the world. You have no occasion to wait and watch for a favorable time. Golden opportunities are oftener ideal, than real. If you let your light shine, others may have reason to glorify God with you. Have you the spirit of kindness and gentleness? Sow broadcast as you go. Make those who know you best publish the "good news" and the aged will have reason to bless you, while all the youth and children will venerate you as one of the Saviours that should arise.

Be to the world a peacemaker, a child of God, and by no means hide the least talent in the earth, nor allow one faculty with which God has blessed you, to be consumed upon your own selfishness.

LET WOMAN CHOOSE HER SPHERE.

—O—
RUTH WEBSTER.

It is plainly seen that our country is in a sad condition, financially and morally. It has been said, by those who should know, that our rulers are the cause of the difficulty. Why complain of our rulers? Are they not just the men you put there to administer the affairs of government? If they are the best men you can get, why not try the women, and see if they will make an improvement? True, they are not prepared, nor will they be until there is some prospect of their having the work to do. Then they will feel the need of a preparation.

All women will not be prepared to take a part in the affairs of government, any more than all men are. Neither will they be likely to fit themselves for such duties, until there is some prospect of their being called to perform them. Woman has an idea that there is some higher mission for her than to be ruled by man and minister to his gratification, so she must and will have a chance to work out this idea. There is no longer any use in reiterating the old story about woman's sphere, woman's duties, etc. Has she not a good right to know where her sphere is and what her duties are, as any man has to tell her? Her sphere is wherever she can do the most good. Her duties are to do whatever she can do well. Her right is to occupy the position in which she can best help her fellows.

There is a sphere of very different character, but it is not woman's sphere, nor do those who occupy it call themselves women—they are ladies. Their duties, if such they can be called, are to amuse those of the opposite sex, dress, go to the theater, go shopping and attend a lap-dog. These and their associates are those who cry out the loudest about woman's sphere.

There is another class who are alarmed lest there be some innovation. They say, "Don't remove the old landmarks." There is no innovation—things occur in the regular course of events. In the beginning, or at the time of the transgression, when man and woman listened to their inferior natures, represented by the serpent, it was said to woman that her "desires should be to her husband, and he should rule over her." Whether this was spoken as prophecy or penalty, is immaterial.

In either case, it has been fulfilled to the letter. She has consented to the condition, and at every marriage has promised "to obey." In some cases the obedience has been rendered grudgingly, in others given as unto the Lord, or as his requirements. The apostle Paul was very explicit in his teachings on this subject. He said he suffered not a woman to teach or to usurp authority over the man, but she was to be in silence, and if she would know any thing, let her ask her husband at home. Here he seems to take it for granted that the young women had taken his advice and got married. Yet he taught that there was a superior condition to this; that the unmarried woman, or virgin, cared for the things of the Lord, that she might be pure in body and spirit; but the married woman cared for the things of the world, that she might please her husband. This might have been right in that day, yet the same apostle also said, that "the time was short, and it remained where those who had wives should be as though they had none;" thus showing clearly that the condition of things then should not always exist. In fact, there was an intimation of the same in the beginning, when it was said the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. In olden times slaves were to be released at stated times, as well as debtors. Is there no release for woman? Is she alone to be held in perpetual bondage? Not so! Woman is to be redeemed. As by woman came sin, so by woman shall she be redeemed. There shall yet be a grand jubilee. Then, indeed, "shall the virgins go forth in the dances of them that make merry." Purity and innocence shall envelop her as a garment, and the graces of the spirit shall be beautiful to behold.

Then shall the curse be removed. Then shall she be free, a subject of the new creation, having no carnal desires, no unhallowed thoughts nor feelings. Nor has she to go to the spirit world to realize these conditions, for it is to be on earth that God's will is to be done, as in Heaven. Here is where the "new heaven and the new earth, wherein shall dwell righteousness," is to be. The old earth and heavens are fast passing away; all things are in a transitory state, hence the commotion.

In the new earth there is to be a natural order and a spiritual order, corresponding to sowing and reaping, or, as it is said, "first that which is natural, then that which is spiritual." There is something for each one to do. Let us see that our own influence is on the side of right, and that we are not too critical as to the modes or instruments used by others; in short, not be like those disciples who said to the Master, "We saw some casting out devils in Thy name, and forbid them, because they followed not us." They were reproved by Jesus.

Things may get a trifle mixed up, but every thing will come out right eventually, for the spirit world is engaged to help on the work, and there is wisdom and love to complete the same. As to the form of government that shall be in the natural order, we are inclined to think it will be Communism, and that there will be perfect equality of the sexes; and, even in this, harmony will prevail.

INDEPENDENCE IN SOME THINGS.

—O—

E. A. SEDGWICK.

In this centennial year, let the people declare Freedom and Independence from Sin.

Let us have a peace jubilee, and permit the spirit of truth to govern the United States, and may it continue as long as time shall last.

Resolved, That we look to Jesus Christ, as our law giver; that we obey his laws, and follow his example; that land, air and water, shall be free to use.

It is selfish for individuals to hold land. Selfishness leads to envy, and envy leads to lust. We know that lust is the cause of sin, and sin is the cause of sorrow. "The wages of sin is death." We can live free from sin and sorrow, if we take up crosses against animal passions.

Selfishness makes us think evil, and do evil, "Charity thinketh no evil, but endureth all things."

If you suffer wrong, resent it not, but endure it; use kind words. "Kind words can never die."

They are treasures of the living truth, found only in Heaven; and if we do the will of Christ, we have Heaven on earth, and the Lord's Prayer fulfilled, as it was in Christ—he practiced all he preached.

It is written "the Kingdom of Heaven is within you," it cometh not by observation, but by works; theory is not salvation, but example is.

TRUTH VERSUS SPECULATION.

—O—

WM. H. BUSSELL.

DIVINE principles are impressed upon the entire universe of God. The human mind perceives no end to the facts that lie before it in the fields of investigation. These principles, however, are not self-evident, and the facts that may be gathered are to be acquired only by labor. But this labor is irksome to many even who take unwonted delight in the possession of truth. They are impatient to arrive at the end, not being aware that the discipline to be acquired all along the course is as valuable as the reward which lies at its termination. They make accurate calculations to satisfy themselves that the day of glory is very near for them, when this tedious process of things shall terminate, no matter how many other hopes may be ruined in the final winding up.

It is this impatience, in great measure, at least, that originates so many speculations which are made to take the place of actual truth. This has been so in all the fields of science, not excepting the very latest. The world owes much to those who apply themselves to the discovery of truths, in whatever fields they lie; these enlighten and edify, but theories unsustained by facts do neither. The investigator of the truths of external nature perceives various facts or phenomena; he wishes to classify them and declare the causes of each; hence arise theories. Other phenomena appear in the course of his investigations that will not fit into the frame already made, and lo! another theory to accommodate the newly-found facts. Hence arise parties in science attached to one or the other theory, according to the apparent strength which the facts give to each. These bear some resomblance to religious and political parties; but, thanks to the harmonizing influences of genuine science, they display not toward each other the rancor and bitterness which the latter have for ages evinced.

All truth is from a divine source, hence religious—that is, tending to develop and refine those who are devoted to it, and raise them by successive steps to the source of all truth. Among the devotees of natural science are some notably skeptical with respect to man's immortality and the idea of a Supreme Being. It may be thought that their devotion to the laboratory, to spectrum analysis, the telescope, the microscope and the various other means of ascertaining physical truths, is the cause of this skepticism. Some, doubtless, would liken them to Bunyan's man with the muck-rake. But all physicists are not such, and these are likely to be found more intent upon theorizing—finding secondary causes—than tracing truths already discovered to their author. After all, they may not be so far away from the divine courts. It is something to have found a potency in nature, the producer of all the forms of varied life. This potency, they may yet learn, is sufficient to confer immortality upon man, as well as to fashion worlds and fill them with their abundant wealth.

Speculations, however, are confined to no one class. They have been far more abundant with the moralizer and the religious devotee than with the scientific class. And, what is worse, these have put their unproved theories in the place of discovered truth, and demanded, not the assent of the understanding, but the slavish obedience of the subjected will to the greatest absurdities that it was possible for human ignorance to invent. But, when reason began to assert its rights, then came the clash and the conflict, between superstition and bigotry, on the one hand, and the soul made conscious that mere chaff had been offered it instead of the essential bread, on the other. So will it always be, whenever mere speculation is allowed to usurp the place of truth. Theories may aid the investigator if kept in a subordinate place until facts prove their truth, when they become an essential part of science. It is natural for the human mind to ask what is the cause of this or that phenomenon. Ignorance jumps to a conclusion, and obstinacy insists that this and no other must be admitted. If the two are strong enough, then they occupy the throne for long and wearisome ages. Truth is eternal, and demands candor, patience and never-ceasing activity in all her votaries; and these cannot fail to be abundantly rewarded in the end.

Facts are not principles. In the physical sciences, the frequent recurrence of certain facts or phenomena has been supposed, sometimes, to prove a general principle; but the failure of these to appear, after a while, has shown that the supposition was erroneous. Notwithstanding a certain degree of uniformity in nature, yet variety is much more noticeable. This is especially so in human experiences. We may all learn something from each other's individual experience, yet hardly any thing can be more absurd than the idea that the experience of any one person will answer, in all respects, for every other, either to imitate or avoid. As well suppose that the clothes of one man will fit every other.

Where principles are involved, experiences are valuable, but the facts of each individual's experience are as varied as the leaves of the forest. Physicians know that the medicine which is adapted to a specific case is not alike operative in all persons. Our daily food acts differently upon different constitutions. Yet, there are those who have their pet theories with respect to diet, which they suppose to be applicable to all persons; or, if not adapted to all, it is because of a violation of nature's laws on the part of some. Such need to learn that nature vindicates herself by all needful uniformity amid variety. Years ago, the eloquence and zeal of Dr. Graham made a powerful impression upon the public mind in favor of an exclusively vegetable diet. Many accepted his views and put his theory into practice, until experience taught them its futility in their own case. Yet, it is not denied that some have been and still are benefited by his teachings.

The lesson to be learned from this is, that theories and principles do not always coincide; that particular experiences are not adapted to all cases, and the more acquainted we become with God's plans and purposes, the less positive we shall be in maintaining our darling theories, and the more ready to concede that others may be on the road to Heaven, though they do not follow exactly in our footsteps. "Truth is truth wherever found;" that alone will set us all free, and finally produce a harmony that mere speculation, with its attendant dogmatism and enforced conformity to mere creeds, has never yet effected and never will effect.

I GO TO BED.

When I have lost all faith in man,
Or failed to consummate some plan;
When women fair are cool, unkind,
And things accord not with my mind—
I do not rashly seize my pen,
And in a hurry there and then
Declare this glad some world to be
One endless round of vanity—
Ah no, for this were mockery—
I go to bed.

When through my head there darts a pain,
And life seems an increasing bane;
When friends their patronage withhold,
And creditors become too bold—
I do not in seclusion mourn,
And curse the hour when I was born—
I go to bed.

When direful news comes o'er the sea,
Or Jones and Smith cannot agree,
When bank securities decline,
And spurious stuffs are sold for wine—
I do not with an awful sigh
Express a wish that I might die—
I go to bed.

When boys refuse to study Greek,
Write moral essays, practice, speak,
When girls of fourteen flirt and lace,
And like frivolities embrace—
I do not on high heaven call,
For one to write our country's fall—
I go to bed.

When some D. D. deserts his creed,
And quacks their many victims bleed;
When editors write sharp replies,
And moneyed men keep back supplies—
I do not then in prose and verse
Implore the gods mankind to curse—
I go to bed.

When couples marry in great haste,
And servants pilfer, fret and waste;
When general courts their terms prolong,
In short, when things get somewhat wrong—
I do not bite my lips and scowl,
And at the children snap and growl—
I go to bed.

I go to bed and soundly sleep,
While friendly angels vigils keep;
But if, however, I awake
Before my ailments me forsake,
I do not of my life complain,
But try the remedy again—
And back to bed.

Ye who have grief, (and who has not)?
Let past prescriptions be forgot,
My panacea for old and young
Is given to the English tongue.
It hath to untold millions wrought
Sweetest relief, nor cost them aught.
And now if you like these would be,
From every pain and trouble free,
Light a small lamp, and come with me—
I go to bed.

MUSIC, NO. 6.

JAS. O. RUSSELL.

REGISTERS OF THE VOICE: In passing from the lowest to the highest tone the voice is capable of reaching, it assumes various shades, or qualities, musically termed registers. Their number, causes, and places of occurrence remain yet, as points somewhat debatable among musicians; hence, the futile attempt here at a definite description of such points, farther than is needful to make clear the subject designed to be brought out.

Upon the authority of Bassini, it may be asserted that the number of registers appertaining to the voice—including both sexes—is three, viz: chest, medium, and head. The tones of the chest register are produced by the vibrations of the vocal cords; bearing, therefore, a close resemblance to tones produced upon instruments of the "reed family." This register becomes the basis of tones in both sexes. Its compass in males (adults) is three octaves, reckoning from the note low C, though hardly, if ever, the case with one and the same voice. Those voices which base their lowest tone on low C, (see example No. 1), are seldom able to go higher than D, or E flat, though Bassini places the point as high as E. Such voices are termed Bass. Those which have their lowest tone (No. 2) on C—are capable, when fully developed, of reaching as high as C, or C sharp, and are termed Tenor. But in this lofty ascension, a change of register is effected. The vocal cords, losing in part their vibration by being thus shortened, become measurably stiff; the air, consequently, passes through a somewhat "fixed and immovable tube," giving to the tone a quality, characteristic of both reed and flute. Tones of this quality are said to be in the medium register, and generally begin upon B flat in second octave, where chest tones (pure) end, and extend upward to the limit above stated. Should tones be attempted higher than the prescribed limit, the vibrations of the vocal cords would cease entirely, and tones thus formed, would be purely upon the principle of the flute, and classed in the head register, which, in males, are considered falsetto tones, and, by some authorities, improper to use. Another class of male voices, termed Baritone, has its compass between Bass and Tenor. Its lowest tone is (No. 3) F, and carries the chest register to B flat, (in second octave.) Here it changes to medium register, and reaches its limit on G, or A flat. But in female voices, are recognized three registers distinct. There are also three classes of voices, viz: Contralto, Mezzo-Soprano, and Soprano. The Contralto voice has its lowest tone on (No. 4) E flat, and carries its chest register to A. Here, it changes to medium, and continues to C sharp; again changes to head register, and reaches its limit on F (in fourth octave). The Soprano voice has its lowest tone on (No. 5) B flat, changes from chest to medium on F, again changes from medium to head, on C sharp, and reaches its limit on E. The Mezzo-Soprano voice has its lowest tone (No. 6) on G, changes from chest to medium, on G, changes to head, on C sharp, and reaches its limit on B flat.

Having given an outline of the various registers of the voice, in our next, will note the difficulties attending their execution, and the proper method for removal.

DEAR EDITOR:—After writing my sixth article, it occurred to me that an illustration by staves might be preferable, if space could be afforded; therefore, have written out the following illustrations. Figures in the article refer to corresponding ones in examples below.

ADD WORKS TO FAITH.

THIS from the Golden Rule is a good warning based on true doctrine, and there is need of both the warning and the doctrine. "Every Christian should beware of his faith, lest he grow to depend upon it overmuch and to deem it sufficient of itself to save him. For there is a faith which is of a deadly sort, and not of a lively, and it worketh death, and not life, to the soul that is drugged by it. This is the faith of those who do nothing, but have faith, and who trust to credulous exercises of their minds, and suppose that salvation will be theirs by reason of their assurance. But the Scriptures warn against this spurious faith, and make clear to all who study the sacred pages, that reliance on it is fatal to one's hope."

A LESSON FROM SMILES.

SAMUEL SMILES.

THE great highroad of individual and collective advancement lies along the old highway of steadfast well-doing; and they who are the most persistent, and work in the truest spirit, will invariably be the most successful; success treads in the footprints of honest and earnest effort.

But if you depend on others to advance your interest, you will wait till it is not worth advancing.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

No. 1.

H. C. BLINN.

It is the "Lord's day," and very appropriately is it designated after this manner. It is a lovely morning, and the season of worship moved in harmony with unseen influences. Active, earnest souls were with us, and through their spiritual ministrations we reached, as did Pilgrim, the Elysian fields, from whence we could see into the paradise of God. And while the worshipers sung sweetly, "Let us grasp the hands of the angels, as they spread their shining wings," a wave of inspiration passed gently over the assembly. It was the voice of peace, as it came from the hearts of many honest souls in thanksgiving and prayer. It was the voice of kindness and love, and it came to us in all the loveliness of a spirit baptism. It was the voice of the sharp sword, as it came to us in a swift testimony against the sins of the world. It was an hour of refreshing before the Lord, and such hours as we may well covet. But I must bid adieu to the meeting, and write you of my perusal of "THE SHAKER."

The close reading of the editorial in the April number, "Will we Sustain the Structure?" calls to remembrance the exhortation of the apostle, "Cast not away, therefore, your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward." Heb. x, 35. The advice is good. We would hold fast our confidence, inasmuch as truth is of the divine mind, and as that truth has led us from the sins of a worldly life, to turn from it — cast away our confidence — which has been the inspiration of holiness to us, would be to turn from God and from all that stimulates to goodness.

We have as strong an evidence as human beings can have, that the foundation of this Gospel work is the spirit of truth, which no deluge can wash away nor even overflow. To build upon that foundation demands of us material of corresponding quality. "Every man's work shall be made manifest." If he build with wood or stubble, he will evidently fail in the day when his work is tried by fire.

A hundred years have already passed since the advent of this Gospel testimony, which came to reap souls from the earth and engraft upon them the heavenly. Still, the foundation remains sure. Will the superstructure, with the advancement of light and understanding, still continue to develop in strength, in beauty and in glory?

No doubt needs be entertained that all who have been baptized into the elements of practical truth, can live in the sweet inspiration of faith. Already have they passed through the gates into the holy city, whose habitation is God.

But the harvesting of the earth, and the building on the foundation must never cease. Holding fast that which is already gained through the prayers, life-struggles and ministry of angels, should never be lost to us.

The pleasures of sin, to escape which our church left Babylon, should be banished forever from the house of God. Vacillating minds may plead inability to an eternal vigilance which is demanded, but as soon as the guard fails, willfully, carelessly or ignorantly, so soon is God's house left a prey to the lusts of the flesh and of the mind. The testimony of Ann Lee, so reverentially spoken of by the Shakers, becomes weak and insipid, and ultimately fails to inspire the soul with that resurrection power which is imperatively demanded to raise from dead works.

Let us live, "SUSTAIN THE STRUCTURE," and exalt the Lord our God in our homes, by the work of our hands and through the Christian ministrations of our daily lives.

Canterbury, N. H.

KINDLY REMEMBERED.

A few days since we received from an aged, gospel mother—Anna Williams—some lines expressive of her feelings concerning our little messenger—THE SHAKER. We give them below. While we call to mind many Sisters at Mt. Lebanon, who are more than 70 years of age, we are particularly reminded of Sister Sarah Bates, almost 90; Anna Williams, 93, and Dolly Saxton, who, ere these lines are printed, will celebrate her more than hundredth year! Not long since, Sister Abigail Munson did the same. It is very pleasant to know that these, and nearly all our aged, are especially attached to THE SHAKER.

LINES FROM ANNA WILLIAMS, AGED 93.

Go, little messenger, carry the word —
Proclaim the good news — the work of the Lord!
Go, comfort poor souls, as monthly they read,
How brightly and clearly, you Zion's cause plead.

To us who are aged, you come with good cheer;
By the young you are prized as a friend wise and dear;
To all, may you be, a bright, shining light,
An accepted guide to the true Christian life.

My love and my blessing shall go where you go,
To the rich and the poor, the high and the low;
My prayers shall go with you, o'er land and o'er sea,
As you carry the gospel of Mother Ann Lee.

Thank you, Mother Anna, and accompanied by the precious anxiety you are feeling, THE SHAKER will bless many souls; and while they read, may they realize the truth that "the prayers of the righteous avail very much" for their success. ☆

GOD IS LOVE.

SIMON MABEE.

Editor of the Shaker:

I HAVE been putting some of my thoughts on paper; can you use them? I am advanced in years — for this age, very old — and being desirous to do all the good I can before going hence, I solicit just space enough to say, how I think God is love.

God loves humanity continually. They that love God, keep his commands. God has so loved that he has ever sent a warning to humanity before he has sent judgment and tribulation, and those who have repented have escaped judgment. The greatest evidence of God's love has been manifested in revealing to human minds how they can be saved from their sins — saved from committing any more sin. All who follow Jesus' example are saved from their sins — sinning no more than did Jesus — and he was saved, all admit. By his example, not his blood, all people may realize the love of God, to their complete salvation; and in this way only, Jesus "will save his people from their sins." By following his example, they will be celibates; they will not fight; they can hold no private property — not a dollar's worth; they will be unworldly, and willing to die rather than forsake true principles. Thus did Jesus. He died for us in defense of principles; he lived for us, "that we might live" as he did. Of such godly love let us be in possession, and do as Jesus did. This love and life are God's love, and the eternal pith of Christianity.

Hancock, Mass.

THE SHAKER AS A PREACHER.

"I LOOK upon THE SHAKER as the very best means of spreading our Gospel principles, and a more effective missionary than any and all other preaching combined. I hope all believers will feel a pleasant duty in circulating and sustaining it." — ELDER AMOS STEWART, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

"We hail the monthly entrance of our SHAKER as a season of large refreshment. The truths it preaches, though as old as eternal hills, are new as to-day. We often feel moved by the inspirations of those who preach through it, and derive an encouraging cheer from such, which, did the authors realize, would well pay them. All hail, THE SHAKER!" — ELDERESS E. FARR, Union Village, O.

"THE SHAKER comes to us in beautiful style. We are pleased with its onward, progressive and determined missionary spirit. May it 'go into all the world.'" — ELDER W. H. WETHEREE, Shirley, Mass.

"Can any feel other than that THE SHAKER ought to be blest with the largest success? And instead of considering it a transient meteor, ought it not to be considered a permanent luminary — one of growth — like a good Shaker, to grow better with every added year? Let us 'sustain the structure' and THE SHAKER by all means." — ELDER H. C. BLINN.

"THE SHAKER is a lively preacher to me. I think its sermons grow better with every additional number." — SHUBAEL PRENTISS, Shakers, N. Y.

THE LEAVEN WORKING.

(New Jerusalem Messenger.)

THIS is the great use of all associated action of every kind. The greatest personal use is not the help we get in accomplishing any particular object, though that may be very large. The most valuable good we get is the reflex action upon ourselves, in correcting idiosyncracies, rubbing off sharp corners, and straightening out crooked lines by contact with others. Society is a gyre in which we are carried round and round and prepared to act in harmony with others. It is very easy for most people to be amiable when no one opposes them, and they come into no unpleasant contacts. The test of good feeling is to have our own plans opposed, and to work with others pleasantly in accomplishing a common end, in their ways rather than our own. When we can do that, we probably get more good from our work than we should if we had our own way. Of course, one plan, considered in itself, is better than another, but the best plan is the one in which the greatest number can be united in a common work. When the people begin to work together in a right spirit, they will soon discover a better way, if there is one, and be willing to accept it. We believe in associated work; and when a man or woman cannot work with others, it will generally be found that they are so crooked that no one can touch them except upon some points in which they come into collision, and they cannot approach others without hurting them, or they are so full of the love of self, and so arrogant, that they think every one must conform to them. We must work together, and the less we are disposed to do it, the more necessity there is for it.

BE LIBERAL. — Condemn no man for not thinking as you think. Let every one enjoy the free liberty of thinking for himself. Let every man use his own judgment, since every man must give an account of himself to God. Abhor every approach, in any kind of degree, to the spirit of persecution. If you cannot reason or persuade a man into the truth, never attempt to force him into it. If love will not compel him to come, leave him to God, the judge of all. ☆

FRIENDSHIP.

In social joys what purer gem
Doth glitter on life's diadem
Than Friendship?

It hath a potent charm to whelm
The drooping heart from grief or sin;
Then guard it well from all alloy—
Keep safely: 'tis no thimble toy—

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

THE COMMUNITY PRINCIPLE.

—o—

ONE of the most remarkable peculiarities noticeable in that pattern of all Christian churches—the Pentecostal Community, original, crude, but beautiful in its principles—is the clause in its constitution requiring the renunciation of all selfish, individual property, for the purposes of faring and sharing alike in all temporal and spiritual economy. No exemption was made to age, sex, nor otherwise. The whilom millionaire, and the previous mendicant, met on a superior level; the captain and the corporal and less, called each other brothers. From that time to the present day, whenever any extraordinary pouring out of God's spirit occurs, in times of refreshing revivals of true religion, this peculiarity is ever prominent. And its absence has ever been as truly significant of a falling away from God's protection. When individuals unbridle their selfishness, and give free rein to an assumed superiority which circumstances have permitted, then appears an indifference to the purest philanthropy, the wringing of sweat from others' brows, and a general race by such to the very devil!

The revivals which have recently moved the masses, in our own and other countries, have beautifully evidenced the congregation, and assimilation of the aristocracy of the rich and the mendicancy of the poor; and when we think how very extreme these castes have been, we cheerfully note it as remarkable, as any similar feature at any previous era.

Regardless of the wisdom or unwisdom, that may characterize the uses of the millions of money which have been so freely given for the needy, we must express pleasure at the activity of the good spirit, that reduces the mountains of human selfishness, only to elevate the valleys of human poverty; and impartation has been very active wherever Moody, Sankey and others have been successful.

We can easily and correctly predict, that by the cessation of this revival spirit, there will be as forcible return of the same aristocratic desire for superior distinction, unfeeling for the poor, and a grasping after, and defrauding the rights of others. A continual growth of the good spirit, manifested in genuine revivals, would eventually cause the rich to throw their entire wealth into a treasury; and to invite the poor to throw their entire poverty into the same trusted inclosure! Would not this peculiarly resemble apostolic times? Would not this be, simply the practical religion of Jesus Christ? What became of the spirit of caste, the rich and poor in his church? How can any church, or members thereof, claim relation to Christ's church, while making and living these class distinctions? Christianity is as earnestly opposed to poverty as to exceeding wealth; but her condemnation must visit the accumulation of riches, in excess. And still there are found many cases, where the rich are fully as willing to lay down their wealth for Christianity, as are the poor to relinquish their poverty for the same cause! Christianity is a very losing business; for by it, entire self is lost sight of, and the prosecution of the right and true of humanity practically engaged in.

There are many thousands who are wonder-struck at the protestations we make of our celibate practice with all which the word celibate can imply; and who almost, or quite doubt the possibility of our asserted rectitude in it, thinking the denial positively unendurable. Yet these scarcely give a thought to the embarrassing denials to selfishness, occasioned by our vows to commune life. Ambitions, talents, business capacities, with anxieties for selfish wealth and superiority to our surroundings, are not quietly put to sleep, nor immediately forgotten by the entrance of individuals into communal life. Many find the "great possessions" their greatest barrier in being Shakers. Nor are they capable of the necessary self denials, excepting by the providence of God, aided by the most resolute wills of their own. Without quite deep religious devotions to this principle of communal life, any thing but community of interests is the consequence.

Nor are we exceptions to this general rule of non-security, when our religious fervor wanes to indifferent consciences. The cooling, cold, or dying of the pentecostal spirit among us, proves our neglect, indifference and death to the common welfare, to which we have given the most solemn vows of consecration. A continual effort at the maintenance of the communal clause is demanded, by those who have their all intrusted to one of their number; well knowing that we as easily drift from our gospel intent, into the formation of upper and lower classes,—rings—with all their appurtenances, unless the religious sentiment is kept wide awake. We have never claimed, nor do so now, that our communal, business interests are perfectly established nor positively safe. Without an extensive tenderness of conscience on the part of Trustees, we could never feel the safety we have felt, desire to feel now, and hope to feel with increasing security time evermore. Apparently, the worldly mind sees in our trusteeships, a scarcely equaled opportunity for selfish considerations; but truly considered, they are, in duty, the servants of the people who trust them, and not a penny richer, nor more able selfishly to please themselves than the least of their brethren, excepting by the violation of sacred promises and principles seldom avowed by one individual to others. Upon the maintenance of trusts so sacredly imparted and accepted, rests the permanence of communistic institutions, as really as upon purity of intention, and extreme honesty of life in any other phase of our communal career. ☆

SACREDNESS OF CONFIDENCE.

—o—

IN Russia, many years ago, two men, engaged in an angry conflict, only desisted when one drew a dirk and killed the other. The murderer ran, knife in hand, into the presence of a priest, to confess his terrible crime. While delivering himself in confession, the lawful officials entered the dwelling of the priest, in pursuit of the murderer. Hearing them coming, the wicked man, dropping the blood-stained dirk, leaped from a back window and escaped. The officials demanded of the confessor the name and confession of the criminal. The priest kindly and candidly repeated to them his vows to maintain the sacredness of secrecy; but, still urged, he positively refused. Placed under arrest, he was tried by the presiding magistrate for particeps criminis, or preventing the arrest of the culprit, by refusing his name and confession. Still refusing to divulge one word, he was sentenced to banishment for life in the cold and barren wastes of Siberia, or to remain there until willing to reveal what had been required. The emperor approved the sentence, and it was executed. For more than two-thirds of a score of years he has endured the terrors of such banishment, remaining true to his vows—and this was his crime. The emperor has lately listened to an appeal for his pardon, and has granted it. He is soon to return to his native city, and we have it upon good authority that the entire populace of the city, regardless of religious persuasions, purposes going without the limits of the city to meet a man so heroic and conscientious as was this priest. Who hath eyes to read, let them so use them; "who hath ears to hear" confessions, let them be as true as this despised but truly noble Catholic priest. Can we learn any useful lesson from his integrity? ☆

PAUL.

—o—

(Intermediate Paper.)

WE intend some further notice of this important character in the near future. But we have received so many letters, pro and con.—the majority, to our surprise, favorable to our position—that a few words are now necessary.

So beautifully sincere are so many who have taken the contra side to us, that we feel their wounds intensely. One, in particular, writes us affectionately: "I find no trouble in harmonizing the writings of Paul with the teachings of Jesus, etc." True, undoubtedly. But while tens of thousands assert the same, each interprets the teachings after his or her own manner, and a strange disagreement has ever been the result. Why has it needed numerous colleges and theological academies, and more than a Philadelphia lawyer's ability to interpret what Paul may have meant? 'Tis not so with men, equally wise to-day. Our dear friend continues: "You make it appear that Paul was very troublesome to the other apostles, violent, etc. But I am at a loss to find wherein, etc." We had particular reference to Paul's terrible displeasure at Peter's conduct at Antioch, at the weaning of Barnabas and others from the Gentiles. There is no doubt that the epistle to the Galatians was written by Paul, while in a fit of very unchristian passion. And yet, we have in this epistle, besides the most interesting record of the epoch, revealing to us, with much precision, the means used to attract foreign nations; the struggles in which the apostles to the Gentiles had to engage, and the numerous compromises to which the Christian doctrine was successively subjected. To read Paul rightly, needs the entire relinquishment of prepossession, and without malice. We apologize for the mistake (second paper) in using the expression "second epistle of James;" we meant chapter.

Our friends and loving foes on this subject are beautifully unanimous upon the essential feature: Regardless of what Paul or others wrote and meant, THE LIFE OF CHRIST IS THE MAIN THING, to which we cannot too quickly nor heartily enough respond, AMEN. ☆

HOME-DRIVEN THOUGHTS.

Was Jesus a Saviour? By obedience to the principles taught by Christianity, Jesus was saved from sin. If Jesus ever proves a Saviour to any others, it will only be by their obedience to the same life-guiding principles that crucified him unto a sinful world.

It is the glory of Christianity, to show what it can do for humanity, not for divinity. Jesus was human, like ourselves, not divine, as too commonly believed. Christian principles elevated him above Judaism, to be what he was. What Christianity gloriously did for Jesus, it will, by our obedience, do for us.

An individual, possessing every Christian virtue, excepting one, is like a golden chain with a missing link.

Persons are not better, excepting in external appearance, because they are ingenious enough to hide their faults.

Who so loves human souls, will not be deterred therefrom because they have faults; and this love is of very few words.

There is no louder nor more effective preacher than example; let the people see as well as hear. ☆

OUR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

WE sometimes have pleasant paragraphs come into our sanctum. We are always happy to have people who write us know that we love to appreciate them.

WE ACKNOWLEDGE reception from one, who loves THE SHAKER best, as the deacon did the meetings he attended — "always have good meetings when I take an active part in them!" Won't some of those grumbling, indifferent, lukewarm and doubtful Shakers write something interesting for our columns?

WE ACKNOWLEDGE having received a certain communication from a lovable correspondent, claiming, "like the colored individual, praying to the Lord, that he didn't trouble him very often, but when he did come, he thought he ought to be noticed." Come on, dear friends, we'll be as nearly like the Lord in patience, under the same circumstances, as we can.

WE ACKNOWLEDGE the receipt of an offer from a talented neighbor, to write a serial love story (!) for THE SHAKER! What next? But our correspondent, in hopes to catch us napping, baited her hook with a bit of originality: She proposed, after having the usual rignarole of moonshine go on, until the usual question was proper, and then instead of its being an offer of marriage, have hero and heroine join the Shakers! Such circumstance has actually occurred in real life, but in declining the serial, we recommend the party to one Bonner, of New York, who, biting at so strong a hook, will introduce a Shaker net into the Ledger!

WE ACKNOWLEDGE, from an anonymous correspondent, (are you ashamed of your name?) the following:

"MARRIAGE."

"Domestic happiness, thou only bliss
"Of paradise, that has survived the fall!"

This was all, and instead of our being surprised at the apparently Miltonian sentiment, we wondered where in all this world our correspondent could get an illustration to prove this assertion true! If the blisters of marriage are all that has survived paradise, we might all despair. We now wonder less, that the individual withheld his name; and are reminded by it of an incident which Beecher tells of: "I received a letter on April first; and on opening it, all I could see was 'April Fool!' I have received many letters in which individuals forgot to write their names; but this was the first time I ever knew any one to sign his name, and forget to write his letter!" We will never think of our correspondent without remembering "April Fool."

WE ACKNOWLEDGE, one more: James Sherman, Rochester, N. Y., writes us a long letter: "Don't send that SHAKER to my wife any more, stop it. Since she began reading it she is a spoiled woman, etc." Now, dear enemy Sherman, if your wife has subscribed for THE SHAKER, we cannot stop it without her request. If she is a nice woman (if she likes THE SHAKER, she must be), and you want her for a wife, we advise you, by all means, to keep THE SHAKER away from her — if you can! We really pity a man who does not like THE SHAKER, and has a wife that does. What dreadful times must be there! We advise agreement between men and their wives; and if your wife is determined to read THE SHAKER and love the Shakers, and you cannot persuade her to the contrary, then you had better agree with her! But we have known some such women before; they seemed so determined to have their rights, that if their husbands had kicked Jesus Christ out of the front door, they would have taken him in at the back window! If you cannot manage that case at home, don't ask us to do so, hundreds of miles off. But THE SHAKER must still live — and we opine, if it does, your wife will manage to get it, and we hope for what is best. ☆

FLOWERS, AND THEIR USES.

SARAH ANN NEAL.

I BELIEVE all things were intended to be made useful. I regard flowers as one of the crowning beauties of earth life, and we have abundant spiritual intimations, that they are so considered in the heavens. I consider flowers one of the requisites to make this life happy; and look upon their culture, as one of the most pleasant and elevating recreations which any can pursue. The tendencies of floriculture are such, that the general temperament of individuals is improved thereby, and thus their real character is beneficially and permanently affected. For children, no better enjoyment can be devised than growing flowers, when not engaged in study or other duties. It affords innocent and healthful exercise to the body, while it prompts the mind to engage in pleasant thoughts, which cause the performance of kind actions. Those who have a natural love for flowers are able to appreciate, immeasurably, their true value; and are fortunate to have discovered, that while nearly all call them beautiful, they are truly subjects for use.

While many floral uses lie latent and hid from the casual observer, one needs but to witness their effects in the sick room, to be convinced that they have a beautiful and useful mission. Here, they more frequently operate recuperatively to the invalid, hastening convalescence, than the hourly or daily "dose" of well-intended medicine. And the smiles which I have seen them elicit under such conditions, have been most appreciative in expressing the worth of their mission. Refined and intelligent society consider flowers indispensable, at least, to the appearance of happiness; and while appearances count for but little, compared with real happiness, still is not the smiling countenance, generally and truthfully taken as the index to a happy mind! And when the physiognomy of home is radiant with sunlit cheerfulness and the brightness of flowers, do these not indicate happiness, beauty, and goodness within? Nature sends forth a spontaneous growth of flowers, which are many fold improved by cultivation. Cultivating the beautiful and useful reflections of spirit life, (and are not flowers such?) we are permitted to participate in the joys of Angels, "all along whose pathway, fruits and flowers are growing!" Like even better, God-given graces, flowers have been perverted to very base uses; and while we strive to lift the head and heart, the tongue and pen to a resurrection above their perversions, and higher than their natural goodness, may we not purify the love for flowers, until all lustful interpretation is forever banished from the mind. Whoever adulterously looks upon the little flower beauty, which lifts its head with the expression, "God made me for use," is an unsafe possessor of eyes to mingle in any human society. Then may we not love more, and have more of "The bright, beautiful, love-beaming flowers,

"Which are linked with life's purest and sunniest hours?"
Shakers, N. Y.

THE CHEMICAL FORCES OF PLANTS AND ANIMALS. NO. 1.

DANIEL FRASER.

If we want twenty-five bushels of wheat to the acre, more than the natural yield of the land, apply 41 pounds of nitrogen, 24 pounds of actual potash and 20 pounds soluble phosphoric acid. And, if you want a few more bushels to the acre, increase the proportion of nitrogen, etc.

What does nitrogen represent in the animal economy? It is the muscle-forming element. The phosphoric acid finds lime in the soil for making bones. What does the potash do? There is very little of it in a pound of grain, but much, comparatively, in a pound of straw. It forms with sand a silicate of potash, and coats the stems of the wheat and oat plants with a beautiful straw-colored varnish. If there is a lack of this substance in the land, the plants cannot varnish themselves, nor stand well up to ripen in the sunshine — cannot resist atmospheric influences, and are blasted, making dusty threshing; the grain also is injured. What a wonderful world we live in! Every grain-plant is a little chemist; it sends its roots into its laboratory, the earth. Interesting chemical changes are in action there, and when the bone and muscle-forming materials are duly manipulated, plant life appropriates, elaborates and stores away, as the bee does its honey in the cell, the rich gluten, the necessary compound for bone, the carbonaceous portion to support respiration, and for all other needed purposes.

These plant-chemists build up their bodies and form their seed with unerring exactitude, well calculated to teach us obedience and stimulate us to thankfulness and love, instituted, as they are, to stand between us and the inorganic world, yielding to us with a liberal hand the beautiful, refreshing, acceptable fruits and precious grains. Our bones originally came from the hard rocks, and bone materials are coming from the same quarter every day. The flesh on our bones, and our skins, which fit us so neatly, come from the nitrogen in the air and from its compounds in the soil. Were it not for these vegetable chemists, we might have to drink a solution of phosphoric acid, eat lime sprinkled with iron rust, and refresh ourselves with a draught of liquid ammonia! Would it not be well for us to lift our hands in admiration, and impress on our hearts to yield cheerful compliance with physiological law in all its righteous requirements? These plants cannot but be true, they have no choice, while we have the dignifying privilege to be coöperators with infinite intelligence, wisdom and love! When we take a contrary course, we blast our bodies and spirits, dwarf our minds and enfeeble our whole beings; we lack strength to take the kingdom of truth, needed in doing violence to the cravings of appetite, and expose ourselves to all the discomforts recorded in the twentieth chapter of Deuteronomy.

Even as plants are chemists, so also, we are endowed with vital chemical power, to transform our food into living fiber, solid yet growing bone, sensitive nerve and thought-sustaining brain.

What interesting fields of duty open here before us. To supply the proper materials and furnish the right conditions, to build up a strong and useful body, that may last a hundred years, and scatter blessings every day, instead of a weakly frame, a diseased burden to others.

See the swallows as they fly; are they not as agile on the wing to-day as their grand-mamas of ten thousand years ago? They have a digestion, so have we; they breathe the blue ethereal, so do we; they live as did their earliest progenitors. Why, then, so much languor, weakness and actual disease in our middle age? Do we supply the proper materials and furnish the true conditions to our vital laboratory, the stomach, or have we departed from the simplicity of our far-off ancestors? Are we content with meal ground till the grains disappear, and no more, or do we grind it to an almost impalpable powder, throw aside the bran, and declare that it (one of the blandest things in creation) is so rough as to scratch our modern throats? Doing so, we separate ourselves from the relationships which infinite intelligence has instituted in the nature of things. If one limb is lame, the whole body is relatively so. If we throw aside the bran, all the flour is injured—weakens our brains and nerves, induces constipation, congestion of the liver, opens the door for quack pills and purges, and invites the frightful spectre, dyspepsia, to come and live, in "the house we live in!" A certain student of nature remarked, "When I look at the starry heavens, and consider the responsibility of man, I am struck with awe!" When I consider a grain of wheat, I am struck with astonishment. The inside of it is for the immediate sustenance of life, the portion next for muscular fiber, the next for nerve and brain food. Inasmuch as we throw aside the bran, we throw aside our brains! I am prepared to presume that many cases of insanity and softening of the brain were due to a want of this brain food.

Shirley, Mass.

It is easy to "know thyself," but who is to introduce you? Most people go through life without making the acquaintance in question; and if a friend should take the liberty of introducing you to yourself you bate him forever.

SPIRIT OF THE FARM NOTES.

—O—

BY THE EDITOR.

The Potato Bug threatens all sections. We hope all farmers will experiment successfully on its extermination. We caution against the much-talked of remedy—Paris Green. We advise, where it can be conveniently done, the rearing of chickens and turkeys among the crop. But the fowls may not be eaten, until they have been again fed for several days.

Apple Tree Worms have been best dealt with by us, by burning them in their nests, before the dew is off in the morning. Tie with wire on the end of a long pole, rags saturated with any pitchy or tarry substance, and in this way a man will free several acres in a few mornings.

Lice on Cattle have been successfully exterminated with us, by painting with lard oil, about the horns, and along the entire spine of the animals. The application should be made on a warm day, and in the sunshine. The lice eat the lard and burst!

Crows and Corn: Few things are more disagreeable than crows, to farmers with nice fields for maize. We have the best of success in putting to flight these brave birds which never show a white feather!

1. Pour over the seed, in a tub or pail, hot water, sufficient to cover it. In a few minutes, pour off the water, and spread coal tar over the top, about a large teaspoonful to the quart. Stir while the corn is warm, and the whole will be handsomely glazed with tar. Add ashes or plaster for better handling, and plant when ready.

2. Feed a few quarts of corn to the crows on the field. Prepare this corn for their especial use. Soak in warm water until slightly swelled; then add about a teaspoonful of strichnine to three quarts, stirring well. Scatter over the field. They won't eat much, and will condemn farmer and field in every crow council.

Paint. Few suggestions are worth more to farmers, than to keep their tools, and general farm apparatus well painted. The oil and paint fill up the pores of the wood, preventing moisture and atmospheric gases, which invariably tend to rot the handles of tools, beams of plows, etc. When next a break occurs, ask yourself, if painting tools does not pay?

Plant Fruit Trees, Evergreens, etc. On this centennial era, let farmers decide to plant many trees. Let their fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers and children give way to a general freedom to plant trees of every variety obtainable. Timber is getting scarce; evergreens were never half numerous enough; and fruit trees will be in greater demand by the increase of population. When an Italian or Spaniard eats nice fruit, he plants the seeds. As the consequence of such practice for many years, the road-sides of their countries are lined with delicious fruits, which are free for every traveler. The practice should be inaugurated, and practiced in America forever. ☆

VALUABLE RECIPES.

—O—

To Mend Chinaware.—Take a very thick solution of gum arabic and stir into it plaster of paris until the mixture is of proper consistency. Apply it with a brush to the fractured edges of the china-ware, and stick them together. In a few days it will be impossible to break the article in the same place. The whiteness of the cement renders it doubly valuable.

Flowers nearly always begin to fade and droop, after being kept for twenty hours in water; a few may be revived by substituting fresh, but all may be restored by the use of hot water. For this purpose place the flowers in scalding water, deep enough to cover about one-third of the length of the stems. By the time this is cold the flowers will have become erect and fresh. Then cut off the shrunken ends of the stems and put them into cold water.

To Improve Court Plaster.—Court plaster often becomes almost useless by age, dampness, etc. It can be made almost as good as new by coating it with the white of an egg.

To Remove Old Putty.—Make a paste of strong soft-soap and saleratus, and cover the old putty. In a few hours it will easily yield to removal.

To Remove Rust from Table Wares.—Cover with sweet oil. After two or three days, a lump of fresh lime will entirely rub out the stain.

To Stop Mouse Holes.—Take nine parts of wood ashes and one part wheat flour; make paste with warm water. When dry you will have an impenetrable mortar.

To Banish House Vermin.—Croton, bed and cockroach bugs, we are assured, can be thoroughly removed by dissolving two pounds of alum in hot or boiling water, and applying to their habitations with a brush. For small families let the quantity of alum be smaller, but as strong as possible.

To Prevent Hens Eating their Feathers.—A writer in the Country Gentleman says, that a sure antidote for this pernicious hen habit is salt! Take a teaspoonful of salt, dissolve in hot water, and mix with eight quarts feed, made of four parts bran, to one of corn meal, by measure.

Burns.—An application of varnish is first best thing to do for a burn.

EVER BLOOMING LILY.—Mrs. Rollins Smith, of Swanton, Vt., writes to the Burlington Free Press as follows: "Since the notice in the Free Press recently of my possessing a continually blooming calla, I have received several letters from different parts of the State asking me for the treatment which produces such favorable results. I use a four-gallon jar, and give an eastern exposure. In the summer I keep it wet enough so the water may stand on the top, and at all times very wet. Once a year I take out the plant, shake the earth from the roots, and fill the jar with earth taken from under old sod. As soon as a blossom commences to wither I cut it down, never allowing a flower to die on the plant. The result is, in sixteen months I have had eighteen blossoms on one plant, and at the present time it has two very large full blossoms."

VALUABLE MONUMENTS.

—O—

It is a little more than six years since Mr. Peabody died, and already ten of the commodious and substantial dwelling-houses bequeathed to the workmen of London have risen in the metropolis, all, save one, being completed and occupied. The first, built in Spitalfields and completed during the life-time of Mr. Peabody, has since been followed by the erection of nine others in various parts of the city. Another is now in course of building, and promises to be the largest of all, for it stands on five acres of ground, and affords a site for thirty-six blocks. In the aggregate the population of Peabody's buildings is not less than ten thousand persons. What the population will be in the course of twenty years might be calculated by an easy sum.

The amount left by Mr. Peabody, with the object of providing "improved dwellings for the poor of London," was $2,500,000. This is a capital sum laid out in an investment returning a certain moderate but safe interest, as it accumulates, becomes available for the building of dwellings; and these will themselves, in the magical manner peculiar to compound interest, add further sums to the capital. Each of the ten houses is a substantial building of twelve blocks, and, taking the average of four in each family, will supply house room for about one thousand persons. In each block there are twenty-two tenements, a few consisting of one room, some of two, and many of three, but each absolutely self-contained, and all as private as need be.

Each of the tenements is well provided with all manner of conveniences. There are a few simple rules enforced in the buildings, but they are designed simply in the interests of order and cleanliness, and for the general good of the little community.

Peabody's buildings never have any empty rooms. At the present moment the one on Southwark street has upon its books three hundred applicants over and above the available accommodation. The tenants are strictly of the laboring classes, it being an unprinted rule of the place that no man earning more than twenty-five, or at most thirty, shillings a week is eligible for admission. Nothing else is required of an incoming tenant further than a voucher of his respectability, generally sought at the hands of his employer.

The Hindoos extend their hospitality to their enemies, saying: "The tree does not withdraw its shade ever from the wood-cutter."

REVIEWER.

—o—
EPITOME OF SPIRITUALISM, ETC.: Herein we have an octavo pamphlet of about 100 pages written in a fair, pleasing and excellent manner; full of anecdotes, good advice and sound philosophy, concerning this age of spiritualistic phenomena. Some of the anecdotes we are perfectly surprised at, if they can be true. The method and philosophy of dealing with mediums, re-incarnation, materializations, etc., we are happy to indorse. Though the author's name is withheld, we suppose it to be Rev. W. F. Evans. Colby & Rich, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

AM. PHREN. JOURNAL: Among our exchanges, we single this as superlative among the monthlies. Since the death of the lamented Wells, it seems to have lost none of its enterprise; but to add to its former celebrity, a determined spirit to be "Excelsior" in reality. The May number is the best ever issued. The spirit of S. R. W. must look down with genuine pride and satisfaction upon the conductors of the A. P. J. and Science of Health. We salute them.

THE LAWS OF LIFE: Published at Dansville, N. Y., has no superior in its line. It has taken its stand on a very firm basis; and while its arguments are sound, their practical results of cure to the curable evidenced at "Our Home on the Hillside," are fruits which are undeniable by any. Poisonous drugs are abominated. "Ceasing to live evil and learning to live well," seems to be the medicine prescribed by The Laws, and the practice of those who publish it, with the patients who come under their influences. We know whereof we speak, when we say the "The Laws of Life" is a most valuable paper, and "Our Home" a very pleasant place to live, either sick or well.

We have had sent us a sample of Noyes' Hand Weeder, a triangular tool with handle. We have seen the claw weeder, but this is worth a dozen claws at about the same price. We advise our people to send 25 cents and get a sample—there will be no regrets. Albert Noyes, Bangor, Me.

A CHARACTERISTIC LETTER.

—o—
BELoved EDITOR: I am too late with the article I did not write for June; but do not think it any want of interest in you. I am very busy; besides, as the tamed and trained buffalo has a tendency to relapse to its original condition, why should it not be so with me? I was brought up on a farm, hate books. Agriculture is natural with me, learning is acquired; I soon relapse into my native ignorance. It is a task to tax my mentality, to study philosophy and the laws of rhetoric. I love to be in the garden, on the farm, in the apple trees. "Music hath charms to soothe a savage;" it may split a rock, or rend a cabbage; these will stay split or rent, but the savage wont stay soothed. I love the music of spring. What is the republic of letters, to the republic of nature! I talk with the trees; I hear what the grass says; the water is eloquent, and the whole earth meditative. The jumble of ideas, the gabble of words, that so perplex the literary, are unknown to the simple and unlearned. Blessed be nothing, and "ignorance is bliss!" True, when deep sleep falleth upon other people—when sable night has wrapped them in her mantle—I do have some thoughts that ask to be recorded; and if I do not pen them down then, they are gone, and now you know what becomes of your (my) articles. Then I have a shrewd idea that the less said, the less trials. I live so much in the future, that the present is justly offended with me. I will, however, catch some good ideas, imprison them in a cage of homely words, and you may use them as you think is for the good of souls. Who knows but the discipline of my rough speech, may be for the health of some unprogressive member of the household of faith! Love to you ever.

VALUE OF DEVELOPMENT.

—o—
JOHN STUART MILL.

A government or community cannot have too much of that kind of activity which does not impede, but aids and stimulates, individual exertion and development.

The mischief begins when, instead of calling forth the activities and powers, and enlisting the interest of individuals and bodies, it substitutes its own activity for theirs; when, instead of informing, advising, and upon occasion, admonishing, it makes them work in fetters, or hids them stand still and does their work instead of them.

The worth of any organized body, in a long run, is the worth of the individuals composing it; and a state that infringes, abridges, or postpones the interests of their mental expansion and elevation, by a little more of administrative skill, or that semblance of it which practice gives in the details of business; a state which dwarfs its men in order that they may be more docile instruments in its hands even for beneficial purposes, will find that with small men no great thing can really be accomplished; and that the perfection of machinery to which it has sacrificed every thing, will in the end avail it nothing, for want of that vital power which, in order that the machine might work more smoothly, it has preferred to banish.

THE WORLD'S EXPOSITION.

—O—
F. W. EVANS.

"Let Church and State be forever separate."
—Grant.

THE Centennial Exhibition is closed one-seventh of the time. Thus American citizens, and citizens of every nation, are, by priestly diction, called Christian, precluded the improvement of this great educational opportunity. A minority compactly organized are lording it over the rights and consciences of their peers—true Americans—the legitimate successors of the so-called Infidel founders of our Government—the only Government on earth not sectarian—Church and State combined; a Government with a constitution that secures the inherent right of all human beings—a right to life, liberty of person, liberty of speech and of religious thought, with its outward expression, such expression not interfering with an equally free expression of citizens of this or any other nationality.

A World's Exposition, indeed, under the management of a committee of bigoted, persecuting theological tyrants, inseparable from Church and State rule! If closed on the Christian Sabbath, it were a thousand times better never to have held this gathering in the City of Brotherly Love, among Quakers, who, as Christians, esteem all days alike good, to those who are good. Nor yet in Pennsylvania, founded by William Penn, who proclaimed liberty of conscience to all Men and Women therein.

Neither should the Exposition for All the World have assembled in the United States, under a Government founded by such men as Jefferson, Paine and Franklin, and sealed with the martyr blood of a Lincoln—Infidel to a spurious Christianity, scripturally called the "Great Whore," because she perpetually lusts after an adulterous association with the Civil Governments of earth, Governments resting upon the sword, and used for the oppression of the people.

The whole American People—Jews, Quakers, Infidels, Freethinkers, Pagan, Chinese, and representatives of all Religions, not Anti-Christian, should rise up in mass and open the Exposition on all days of the week, beginning with the Sabbath, or remove the whole mis-representation of a World's Exposition into Spain or Mexico—some legitimate Constitutional Church and State Government. In America it is a gross libel upon our Constitution. The same insidious clerical power that has closed the Exposition upon their typical, ceremonial Sabbath, has, thereby, taken one step toward subverting the Constitution itself. Let free America rebuke that power, and, with Grant, proclaim that, in one nation, Church and State shall forever be separate.

In the first Constitutional Convention we were trapped—caught napping. A seed of Slavery was left in the Constitution. We are paying the cost of that error. Shall we commit a second error, and permit subtle priestcraft to sow the seeds of a religious, civil war in our Centennial Constitution? Then shall we have been recreant to our duty as American citizens, false to our profession of liberty of conscience, and faithless to the sacred trust of guardians of the rights and liberties of humanity the world over. Let there be on earth one free government, where the whole world can meet at their own discretion, on everybody's Sabbath day. That will be the great Sabbath of rest from religious persecution—a Sabbath that will forever remain for the People of God.

As a Shaker, I believe the Civil Government should be a Republic of citizens—Men and Women of all races and nations, possessed of equal rights to life and land—to liberty, unadulterated by sectarian theology—to freedom from debt, war, poverty or riches. Then we can also have a spiritual church, in God, possessing no earthly power other than the power of truth, as exhibited in holy lives by its communicants.

STEADFASTNESS.

—O—
BY G. B. AVERY.

THE overruling fault of the great throng of Pilgrim Progressionists—that which blights the visionary harvest of rewards of millions who make a bold start in the pathway of progression, is vacillation. The trials incident to an earnest endeavor to rise out of the vast slough of degradation, ignorance, supine indifference to improvement, and shameless folly and sin which is the characteristic element of the massive millions of earth's inhabitants, which goad the feelings of the pilgrim and prompt a return to former conditions, to plod along with the masses in slothful ease, error and dishonor, the jibes, sneers and rebuffs which a pilgrim progressionist has to meet from the idle, careless throng he is leaving behind, are things hard to bear; and a soul needs the shield and fortification of a firm conviction of the truth and righteousness of the work of progress undertaken, with a godly and heroic philanthropy that points upward the sight, to view a worthier purpose for which to toil through life, and unfalteringly holds up the resolution to live and strive for this purpose, and to accomplish it though companions should flinch and fall on every side.

Every Christian Pilgrim Progressionist should remember that never yet did even one soul perseveringly and consecratedly pursue the Christian's pathway but was scoffed at by the world, and deemed an enthusiast, a lunatic, or a fool! Even so in the arena of progress in science, art, or literature. The inventive progressionists—the world's greatest benefactors—those who have awakened the world from torpidity, advanced the development of improvement in human conditions, have generally led lives fifty, one hundred, five hundred, or a thousand years in advance of the masses, and, by them, either looked upon as utopian dreamers, insane enthusiasts, or fools.

But those of this class who have had the dignity and philanthropy to persevere and go ahead, despite all opposition, thus showing themselves true men and women, instead of mere human tools, to be handled by the masses at the nod and beck of fashion, public opinion or prejudice, as the wake and wave of public sentiment might flow for the moment, have been the Benefactors, the Saviours, and Redeemers of the race. These are the only human beings worthy of the title of men and women. And surely none others justly merit the name of Brothers and Sisters in Christ's Kingdom.

It is related by the biographer of Demosthenes, that he went into the public halls and called out, "Come unto me all men." The populace began to gather around him, and he commenced to cane them, crying out, "I called for men, these are nothing but excrescences." They were the masses of unstable, weak, foolish, fashionable, giddy and purposeless throng, who were drifting on the ocean of circumstances without a rudder of fixed purpose to guide their barques to a harbor of progressed improvement and excellence.

There has of late been a very great anxiety among Believers in the Kingdom of Christ, to have some council of the wisest and most progressed souls held at some location where such council might discuss the important subject of the most efficient means of awakening a renewed vigor of progress in Gospel Travel, and a manifesto and disbursement of power that should call into Zion's ranks an abundant harvest of souls, to heighten, enliven and quicken the spiritual and social status of Zion, and make her what she is called to be, "the light of the world," "the salt of the earth." The city of glory set on a hill as example to the nations of God's righteousness and goodness manifest among men—the true epistle of Christianity to the unbelievers.

Ah, we might multiply councils infinitely, and discuss ways and means with the wisdom of the sages of Solomon, suggest stimulants to fire the resolution, and excitements to progress, as numerous as the pearly dew-drops of the morning, but, like them, when the sun of righteousness should shine upon them, all would pass off in vapor, without a soul work of conviction of the shiftness of sin, and the folly and misery of a worldly life, of such force, depth and intensity as to turn souls short about from their worldly career of life, and cause them to be willing, and not only willing but unflinchingly determined to die to its life! to confess sin, repent and turn to God.

At present the prevailing wave of public feeling is as fickle as the colors of the rainbow. And the popular religion of the day is largely verbose and so smallly actual that its power is mostly swallowed up in a sea of elocution. Its "salt is largely without a savor." But words are like carriages, they may run empty or full of meaning and power, but their fullness is largely due to the embodiment of their sentiment in the life pulsations of the speaker.

What is needed, without the aid of a council to dictate it, is an earnest, zealous, persevering stability in living the Christ life, so that a power may flow forth to humanity that is like an ocean's wave — mighty in baptism, with salt enough to save!

BEAUTIFUL RIVERS.

—O—

MARTHA J. ANDERSON.

Beautiful rivers, like silvery threads —
Coursing their way over dark sandy beds,
Sweeping through valleys and circling the hills,
Gathering the ripples from thousands of rills, —
Flowing from mountain, from rock, and from dell,
Ocean-bound waters with music to swell,
Brooklet and fountain, and deep placid lake,
Greet the bright waves on your surface to break.

Beautiful rivers that gladden the earth,
Spirit of waters with joy gave you birth!
The smile of her face was impressed on your tide,
Beaming forever as onward you glide;
Joyously slinging the song of the free —
Giving with pleasure your wealth to the sea;
Dancing, and glancing, with sunbeams at play,
Never shall cloud on your sunny face stay.

Beautiful rivers, majestic and grand,
Blessing the desert of Egypt's fair land!
Waking the verdure 'neath tropical sun,
Flowering the sands where your golden streams run;

Filling the air with the moisture it needs, —
Rising like incense of kind, loving deeds —
Forming the clouds over mountain and plain,
Falling in copious showers of rain.

Beautiful rivers that rolled on your way,
Long before man saw the light of the day —
Long e'er the light gazelle sought you to drink —
Long e'er the wild races dwelt on your brink —
They who made hunting and fishing their aim
Came and passed on, yet you flowed on the same!
Now, all along by your rocky bound course,
Shrills the shrill voice of the fleet iron horse:
Civilization, with quick pulse and heart —
Rears its bold front and its busiest mart.

Beautiful rivers! so calm in your flow,
Vessels of freight, safely sail to and fro —
Gliding like nymphs o'er your broad open breast,
PloUGHing the waves to a foam-beaten crest,
Thus through the means art and science can wield,
Men interchange the rich fruits of the field;
Commerce and trade, with their works of renown
Spread their white sails by the city and town.

Beautiful rivers! your murmurings sweet
Sing to my spirit of concord complete;
Ev'ry clear drop that may enter your tide,
Knows not the spirit that seeks to divide;
O! that life's current thus smoothly might roll,
Free from the care that perplexes the soul,
Stirring its depths, till the whirlpool of strife
Sinks all the good that would gladden our life.

'Tis by the side of some beautiful stream,
I would sleep my last sleep, and dream my last dream!

Waking to joy on the bright sunny shore,
To walk by the river of life evermore!
Leaving no trace of my pilgrimage here —
Save in the hearts of the loving ones dear —
Ripples shall murmur a song soft and low,
As the tide of my life on forever shall flow!
Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

PRAYER.

—O—

O. C. HAMPTON.

PRAYER is an earnest petition to God or other intelligences higher than ourselves, for certain blessings and comforts positively; or, negatively, for assistance and deliverance from sorrows and dangers besetting us, which those higher powers are supposed by the petitioner to be able to bestow. Sometimes these prayers are addressed to kings, presidents, legislative bodies, right here in our own world; sometimes to angels — Jesus Christ — God. Prayer will continue as long as intercession continues to be a necessity of humanity, and an atonement with better beings and conditions is an active element of man's nature. No matter how much infidelity, nor how many scoffers at prayer there may be in the world — in times of peril, sorrows, sickness (of soul or body) men will continue to pray, infidels and all; and so long as we have sweet and holy aspirations for better things, we shall give expression thereto in Prayer. If I had been one of the ministers to whom John Tyndall proposed to institute daily prayers for the relief and recovery of the inmates of a certain number of hospitals, for some given number of months, I should not have hesitated a moment to have tried the experiment; and they showed a most lamentable want of confidence in their own profession by declining his proposal. His proposal was perfectly fair, and if prayer cannot be vindicated on the grounds of his plan it cannot be vindicated at all. Some honest men who would consider it a grievous thing to be called infidels, assert that all God's laws are of necessity bound in chains of everlasting fixity, and therefore cannot be modified by any amount of Prayer. And yet these same persons describe God as a being altogether incomprehensible to finite intelligences. How do they know, then, that eternal fixity is an attribute of a being they know nothing about? For all that can be proven to the contrary, unfixity or eternal change is as much an element in the character of God's laws as eternal fixity. Evolution is supposed to be one of those laws, and what of that? Again we do not know how much of the universe, indeed whether or not all of it is manipulated by finite intelligences in an infinitely ascending category of degrees of power and wisdom. Indeed, there are good reasons for supposing that what are called the laws of the universe are and must continue to be dead or dormant negations, only as they are brought into active visible existence by the finite intelligences of the universe. Take the laws of the transmission of thought around the globe in one hundredth part of a second! Without a Morse it might have remained a dead negation, incarcerated in a tomb of everlasting silence and inactivity, or had not a finite mind felt the necessity of its active agency and brought the conditions together for its deliberation. So with steamships without a Watt, Fulton, and so of photographing without a Daguerre. If, then, the laws of the universe appear to be only latent possibilities, with latent powers capable of manipulation by finite minds, not yielding any visible results till they are thus manipulated, why should it be incredible that these laws may be modified in their operation, intensified, or even suspended in their activity for a time, by finite manipulations of the conditions upon which these phenomena depend! And as we know that finite minds can be moved and propitiated in our favor, how can it be inconsistent to pray for any blessing? we are in need of, either temporal or spiritual? and echo answers why.

Union Village, O.

ANIMADVERSION ON PARTON.

—O—

EDITOR SHAKER:

In the May number of THE SHAKER I noticed an article entitled "Parton's Apology," and I would beg leave to take exceptions to some of the sentiments expressed therein.

The historian says: "But it was not Calvin who burned him (Servetus). It was the century. It was imperfectly developed human nature, etc., etc."

I would ask, what makes a century or an age characteristic if not the men who are the chief actors in the affairs of their time? When Napoleon I. caused the murder of the Duke d'Enghien, surely no one will ascribe that horrible outrage to the age, and relieve the imperial criminal from the odium attached to that deed. And when a Belknap shamelessly betrays a high trust and brings dishonor upon his country, who will have the temerity to screen him by pleading in extenuation the nineteenth century?

The writer furthermore apologetically suggests, "imperfectly developed human nature." Is a person who can so far forget himself as to cause the excruciating death of his opponent, where the points of difference were at best but trivial, and the unfortunate victim of his hatred, his peer, if not his superior in morality, virtue and learning; a person who at the same time assumes to interpret scripture and to establish a system of religion for mankind, is such a person to be excused by "imperfectly developed human nature?" However charitably we may be disposed toward the tyrant who could so abuse his power, it would be wrong to hide the fact from the world that he never felt remorse or repentance, but in after years ferociously asserted that under like circumstances he would do so again. A deed which would have stained the character of a Nero, becomes a crime of lasting infamy in a Calvin.

But the doctrine is false and pernicious. Men are individually responsible for their acts, and no power in heaven nor earth can change the fact. True, there may be extenuating circumstances in every case, yet the deed remains the same after all, and how will you secure justice to the wronged victim?

Whatever James Parton's opinion may be concerning those dark transactions with which the name of the Geneva divine is connected, he is doing a good work in thus bringing them before the public; for there are millions of the followers of Calvin who have never heard the sad story of the unfortunate Michael Servetus.

Yours,

LOUIS BASTING.

THE STORMY SEA.

E. A. SEDGWICK.

WHEN troubles and rough feelings come upon our minds making them like the restless ocean, let Christ arise within us, and "rebuke the wind and wave," bringing a peaceful calm.

Let reason have its rule; then we will sail smoothly on the waters of life, unruffled by the tempests of passion.

Let us try to live above trouble, counting ourselves the master and not the servant.

If the principles of Christ are within us no trouble can sink our souls.

SOLILOQUY.

MARIA WITHAM.

MY mind abandons itself to reverie, and is transferred in ecstacy to nature and nature's God. It sees in the simplicity of nature's elements and laws the wisdom and majesty of the great Creator. I feel withdrawn from earth and rise above the little theater of human passions and anxieties to lift my soul in pious contemplation. My mind expands with fervent desires for Truth and Knowledge; and I scale heaven's pure walls with truthful aspirations rather than worship the good opinion of erring man. In the gilded canopy of heaven, Divinity reigns in all the grandeur of its attributes, greatness and strength, and travels through the dominions of an unlimited monarchy. Fancy may take its flight far beyond the power of eye or the telescope. It may expatiate in the outer regions of all that is visible, yet who shall have the boldness to say that the wonders of the Almighty are at an end, because we can no longer trace his footsteps! Let me rather say with the Psalmist, "What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him!" O bounteous one, what have I not received from thee! Throughout the seasons that are past, I see sweet places everywhere. My body and soul have been fed by the most congenial food. Thy chastening hand has proved a blessing; and looking backward through time that has passed, and along the way my feet have pressed, what have I not received from thee, my strength, my stay. A moment from this outward life I joyfully retreat, and in thy presence tell thee, that within I feel so satisfied thy cross to bear. Oh, do not spare the chastening rod that keeps me by thy side. Oh, sweetly give me strength to bear whatever waits me here.

THE LIGHTED TEMPLE.

MARY WHITCHER.

"Cast the beam out of thine own eye."

Subdue thyself, then beauty will appear
Where now thou seest it not;
For when the mental sight's not clear,
Motes will be seen, and many a seeming blot.

Only by light within, and heart made free
From sin and all the stains of sin,
Art thou prepared to rightly see,
And cast thy brother's beam from him.

So near to God, then let my spirit move —
So full of goodness let my motives be —
That I may kindly see, and truly love
My fellow men, as God hath love for me.

NOTES BY THE WAY -- NO. 2.

H. C. BLINN.

As I write the above title, my first thought is to pencil a few religious notes adapted to the necessities of those who are stepping upon the stage of active life. There can be no doubt, that line upon line and precept upon precept will be as much needed for a few years to come, as they were supposed to be in the past.

I had no sooner written my first word, when an illustration of real life that some kind friend had sent to me, attracted my attention, and this was no less than a chicken, just emerging from its shell! Already it had assumed an attitude of defiance, and was ready to contend for its privileges, with a character of a full grown of its species.

Well, I remarked, here is a lesson for the present generation — a picture for precocious children. Indeed, it might be studied with profit by fond but foolish parents, and with no less care by the would-be-wise. And then herein is a lesson for our own religious order: Dependent as we are upon the world for all accessions, we should not let the subject of children pass carelessly by. Solomon's wisdom has lost its charm over the child, if it ever had any. "Train him up in the way he should go," sounds well, but the attempt to reduce it to practice is something more than sounds. Born into this world, filled to overflowing with an inherited tendency to all the ills of the flesh, it would need an angel on the right and left side to keep him from willingly falling into sin. However, I shall leave the chicken with its fighting proclivities developing so soon after its transition state, and perhaps by-and-by I may learn the great difference, should there be any, between the development of life in this order and that of a class which assumes to be more exalted in the grand scheme of creation. "First that which is natural and afterward that which is spiritual," seems at this time for the writer, as it no doubt often does to others, as an anodyne to the mind. It is, indeed, the legitimate order of our lives in this world and may be all for the best.

I must now make reference to the Apostle Peter who took such an active interest in the happiness of those around him, for he speaks thus pleasantly to us: "He that would love life and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile." To those who are young, in an especial manner, I would commend this exhortation, and urge upon them the necessity of allowing it to shape their lives. "Good days" are an inheritance far preferable to great riches. It is a legacy which the wealthy of this world can never confer upon their heirs at law.

Those who are so fortunate as to obtain the treasure, must obtain it through their own labors of self-denial — by the cross of Christ. The professor will "love life" because of the good he may do.

It is not to those only who are addicted to the use of vulgar and profane language that this has a direct application, but it is equally potent to that class, who profess to be cultivated for the society of the virtuous and refined. Indeed, it is to be more dreaded, in its advances, as it comes from what is assumed to be the higher ranks of society.

It is the ferocious beast, lurking under the false garb of cultivation. The viper charming his unsuspecting prey, while the innocent mind thinks only of the external beauty.

Let every young person refrain his tongue from evil, or he may have occasion to mourn when it is too late, — when "those days shall come in which he will say I have no pleasure in thee."

FAREWELL COUNSEL.

WILLIAM H. WETHERBEE.

May God in His mercy be near and direct you,
While passing along the rough journey of life;
May His angels at all times watch o'er and protect you,
Whene'er you sojourn where temptations are rife.

Should the phantoms of earth shine brightly upon you,
With their promised pleasures that fair would allure,
Then stand ye with firmness, let no one take from you
The garment of innocence, spotless and pure.

When far in the west (if perchance you should go there),
And trials and troubles you still there should meet;
When you find in your rambles true comfort is nowhere,
Then hasten ye back to this lowly retreat.

Here peace and true comfort and justification
Are free for the honest, the humble and low;
And though they are found in a meek, humble station,
They are worth more than all this earth can bestow.

A few days will flit, and will end earthly pleasure,
Then tangible objects will vanish like dew;
The spirit immortal will then need a treasure —
Remember this, Rose, for 'tis written for you.

THAT DREAM.

BELOVED EDITOR:

Your letter, requesting particulars of dream mentioned in Atlantic Monthly for June, is at hand. Uncertain that others will be benefited by my compliance, though to me the dream is a remarkable fact. I wish I could give the inspirational force, which accompanies every remembrance of it, even at the present time. We, my whole family, left Liverpool, March 15, 1842, in the then new Packet, SHERIDAN. We were four days and five nights clearing St. George's Channel and Irish Sea, experiencing the equinoctial storm, which was very severe indeed. I kept a daily journal; and among many interesting incidents that may to-day be read therein, I find entered: "Mar. 22: Had a most remarkable dream, during the little broken sleep of last night. I was proprietor of large pleasure grounds and gardens in America. Had Father, mother, Mary Ann (then my wife, now my gospel sister, children, with Grand Fathers, Mothers, Uncles, Aunts, and a great many respectable people, all enjoying these beautiful grounds and gardens! A strange mingling of feelings are mine — bitter and sweet — kind and unkind!" Such is the memorandum. As before intimated, it is quite impossible to communicate the impression made on my mind. And when I came to Shirley, in March, 1849, and recognized that very spot of beauty, what could express my wondering surprise? I have not seen here, all the parties named in my dream, some, even then, being dead; but I have met here, some whom I then did see, and whom I never met before! The spot is not in as high a state of cultivation as I then saw it; but what I may realize when my mortal is "put off," or when, like Elisha's servant, my spiritual eyes are opened, I know not. Neither have I, in a worldly view, realized the proprietorship—excepting in the nobler intent of "they that buy, as though they possessed not"—and thus, my dream has been fully experienced. To this day, I cannot approach that particular spot, without a now feeling of gratitude, that my feet were led to Shirley, where I have found so much of good—so much of God manifested. I have ever esteemed the dream as a "special" providence (if you please), to strengthen and confirm my spirit; though what angel ministered it, must be determined in the future. If any others can thereby be comforted, I am glad, and shall feel amply paid for intruding so much of my personal history upon them, in yielding to your request. With never-failing love,

I am, yours, JOHN WHITELEY.

P. S.—I was very much pleased with your communication to the Albany Express, and think you will be equally pleased with Eldor Daniel Fraser's criticism upon it. We had 275 copies of Howell's article struck off, and have had copies of your Express letter printed to accompany them wherever sent. The world moves! and the call for light and truth is steadily increasing. Let us keep good courage—let it not fall—and if we keep good, we will never be forsaken of God, the great fountain of all good. Farewell.

LOVE vs. FEAR.

—O—
JOSEPH WOODS.

THE Apostle John says: God is love; He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him.

In love there is no fear. He that feareth is not made perfect in the love of God, for he is still in danger of being overcome by the powers of evil, and by the god of this world. The evidence of our love to God will be the manifestation of our love to our brethren and sisters. If a man love not his brother whom he has seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen! St. Paul feared, after having preached to others, lest he should become blinded by the spirit of this world and turn from God. Have we any less need of watchfulness, until we have overcome the world? We have the example of Jesus and many others of being filled with the spirit of God.

Ecclesiastes sums up the whole matter in a few words—Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man. Fear may be well for those who, like Moses, Nehemiah, and King David, regarded God as absolute Judge, taking vengeance on those who knew Him not.

Those who conceive God to be such a being, and the devil corresponding in some respects, full of wrath—going about as the roaring lion seeking whom he may devour—truly with such a frame of belief well might fear lest they be destroyed in whatever course they might pursue.

Fear induces a slavish obedience, and in persons of this class, it may, perhaps, out of servile fear, place some restraint upon their passions, lest wrath overtake them. Not that they see any thing lovely in God or goodness or have any the less inclination toward that which is corrupt.

But close upon this follows the law—

"What a man soweth that shall he also reap." Laws appertaining to the natural and spiritual world are as essentially God's laws, and a violation of either brings a corresponding penalty—we reap what we sow.

This can be no special judgment from God, but rather the condemnation of our own lives. St. Paul says: "He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption," and this he describes as adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, strife, seditions, heresy, envyings, murders, drunkenness, etc., and that they who commit these things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

Will those who live after the course of the world and harvest to themselves a part or all of the forementioned evils, charge God as the author of the same? The rational and enlightened mind will no doubt admit that it is the harvest of his own sowing—the fruit of his own labor. It is well for the transgressor to fear God, for falling into his hands is a fearful thing. Some have thought that Jesus taught his disciples to fear God rather than to love him, when he said: "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Love casteth out fear, and certainly love is preferable, for they that dwell in love dwell in God.

Why should we make ourselves miserable, when we might, by obedience to the law of Christ, be happy?

MUSIC, NO. 7.

—O—
JAMES G. RUSSELL.

ALTHOUGH there are specified points in the musical gamut for change in the registers of the voice, such assertion is not without its modification, that singers meet with difficulties seemingly insurmountable. As "command of hand is the soul of penmanship," so likewise, command of tone is the soul of music. Having a theoretical knowledge of the points where the registers change, the inefficient singer will experience a weakness in power of tone at those points where the changes occur, which can be remedied only by a practical acquisition of tone command. A better explanation is unsought for than that given by Bassini, concerning the junction of the chest and medium registers. He says: "In training the voice, the teacher should commence with the chest register; and this from the fact that where the chest and medium registers play into each other, the voice is weak and uncertain, and it is an extremely difficult matter to equalize it. But this equalization is just the important task to be accomplished. The method to be pursued is this: the tones which are common to both the chest and medium registers, must be practiced alternately with each. For just as the skillful workman, who would join two pieces of wood and make the strength at the points of adjustment equal to the rest, will dove-tail the two, by extending the end of one sufficiently far in upon the end of the other to prevent any weakness at the extremities; so the skillful teacher will extend the limit of one register into the middle of the next, until the weak tones of both are blended, and become equally sound and strong—the point of contact being smoothed and obliterated altogether."

The quoted remarks apply particularly to the chest and medium registers, as the same author remarks also, that "the medium and head registers do not at all coincide, and have no tones in common—a fact explained by the identity of tube." Prominent, then, in the great field of music culture, is the arduous task of combining the chest and medium registers in a manner, not only to make the tones equally strong where the two registers meet, but also to acquire that command of tone, that the voice never may be injured by an unconscious forcing of the registers beyond their natural position—a fault alarmingly conspicuous, and often attended with most serious consequences on the part of the singer, especially at that critical period of life termed the "age of puberty." At that season the voice is undergoing a decided change in both quality and pitch of tone. With males, the change is peculiarly marked by an anatomical alteration of the larynx, whose enlargement assumes a conspicuous prominence in the throat, the voice descending a whole octave in pitch from the position it occupied in childhood, becomes extremely masculine, and, for a season, frequently beyond power of control. With females, the change is less marked, as the voice retains its pitch, yet changes essentially in quality and volume of tone. But no less injuries are likely to accrue, if due cognizance be not taken of the circumstances attending this peculiar season of voice-changing. The warning words of the eminent Bassini are these: "Many voices are irretrievably lost during this time through carelessness of their possessors, or the ignorance of singing masters." It should become, therefore, the irresistible conviction of every singer, that the laws which govern the musical universe are as fixed and unchangeable as those pertaining to the organism of our physical being; and just as assuredly we must reap the fatal consequences of violated law in the former case, as we would expect to reap them in the latter.

REGRETS.

—O—

How often for treasures and pleasures we sigh,
Which, when ours, unnoticed, we permit to pass by!
A. Calver.

On time's hastening current we are carried along,
Each day to our goal drawing near;
But how oft we're impressed by an influence strong
To pause in our rapid career—
To pause for reflection—the past to review,
Its good or its evil recount;
And thus we can test, if our hearts are but true,
The clearness of life's flowing fount.

We sigh for the hours that have passed unimproved;
They are fled, and we sigh but in vain;
Thus moments misspent are as blanks in our lives,
Or as blots we're compelled to retain.
We cannot efface from our memory's chart
The time we have wasted each day;
Thus treasures escape and we value them not,
But sigh when they're far, far away.

How many the times, when good might be done,
Have slipped unimproved from our grasp,—
Where help to a friend or brother in need,
Our hearts in true friendship would clasp.
For our light and enjoyment increase every time
That we shed on our neighbor a ray;
Thus pleasures escape, and we let them pass by,
To sigh when they're far, far away.

We have health—'tis a treasure that God has bestowed,
And each has been blessed with a share;
But if we neglect His immutable laws,
'Twill be lost—still we seem not to care.
At last to our sorrow we find it is gone,
We are paralyzed then with dismay;
Thus treasures escape, we have let them pass on,
To sigh when they're far, far away.

But there is a tie which binds us to earth.
 'Tis an anchor which heaven has given;
 Were it not for this bond our frail bark, many times,
 On the rocks of despair might be driven.
 It lightens our sorrows, and brightens our joys,
 Dispelling the clouds from our way;
 While thro' storms and temptations it bears us along,
 Dispensing a life-cheering ray.

This treasure is friendship—the friendship of those
 Who are toiling along by our side,
 Who have with us rejoiced, and in sorrow have mourned,
 By temptations alike have been tried;
 But how bitter the thought, when, by passion or pride,
 Or envy, we've severed the tie!
 Thus treasures escape, and we value them not,
 But lament when we find them passed by.

Then let us take heed of the warning in time,
 While these pleasures and treasures are ours,
 Nor e'er be decoyed from the pathway of right,
 By the sheen of a few fading flowers.
 Our time, health and friendship in season we'll prize,
 Improving these treasures each day;
 Nor let them escape till they have passed by,
 To sigh when they're far, far away!

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

THE RELIGIOUS TEST.

—o—

WHILE many thousands beneath the influences of revival manipulators are "experiencing religion," it appears proper that we, as religious commentators, should consider in what true religion consists. Ere this we have expressed our joy that any and many should perceive and embrace the opportunity to lead a better life. We need not ask what the motives were that induced this determination, nor to what particular ism individuals may have given their adhesion; being satisfied that any motives which have prompted men and women to forsake the bad and accept the better, are constituents of true religion. Such "change of heart" evidences a new departure in life practice, and is of incomparable value, while mere theology remains a dead letter. We are confident that our world is in a measure magnetically influenced and attracted by the Christ Spirit. That there are seasons in human life when the polarity of individuals stands corrected by this magnetic influence. With this polarity of spirituality established, the whole life comes en rapport with angelic goodness, and the fruits of true religion are apparent in their changed life. Corrected thus, the libertine, magdalen and generally immoral sensualist are confronted by their highest consciousness of right and reform. Thus the drunkard leaves his cups and becomes a saviour to those in his whilom degradation; and the devotees of all crime are, by this same Christ inspiration, helped to experience that true religion which establishes a polarity in all moral rectitude. We have enumerated some of the worst of classes. But the grand majority which as really needs to "experience religion," and move to superior life is composed of those who congratulate themselves that they are "pretty good," and "not so bad as very many who are worse!" who think their present rectitude an all-sufficient apology for not exerting a more discreet polarity with the heavens. No sooner do individuals arrive at a station they once thought good, than true religion presents the better to their view, and they travel toward another satisfactory conclusion, only to be still directed onward. The test of all true religion is nowhere written in theology, but is only expressed by more active, more pure life. Too frequently all the religion people have is in "joining the church," and assenting to certain formulas of theology. Doctrine is fruitless, and mere persuasion that this or that theology is correct is worse than useless, unless the life test is made. The test of the Christian religion is manifest in the fact that its adherents come into complete conformity or polarity with the Christ life, manifested by Jesus' example—whose feminine counterpart in identical life we consider was Ann Lee. Would we make the test of how religious we are, let us compare our daily lives with the same of him who invited "Follow me!"

This is the test Shakerism teaches its subjects to make. Unless Shakerism helps the impure to become pure, and these to become exceedingly pure, it is not what is wanted by humanity. Unless it urges laws that change the selfishness of human hearts into active philanthropy for "the household of faith" at least, it will not stand the test. Unless it presents a superior realm of pure and peaceful life than is found on the plane of the best of earthly life, it does not bear the test of true religion. While we urge our brotherhood to an exceeding watchfulness to prevent self and selfishness, like unto an ancient golden calf, from becoming objects of worship, and to be jealous of those heaven-born principles that inculcate, and enforce self-denial to every thing that opposes PURITY, PEACE, EQUALITY and UNWORLDLY LOVE AND PRACTICE, we invite the investigation by all, of the principles of Shakerism as a true religious test, and as the guide of those who would live, like him whose kingdom was not of this world. ☆

SHAKER INSTITUTIONS.

"[From Albany Express.]

LETTER FROM EDITOR G. A. LOMAS, OF "THE SHAKER," REPLYING TO W. D. HOWELLS' ARTICLE IN THE JUNE ATLANTIC.

To the Editors of the Albany Morning Express:

Your kindly hint, that Elder Evans or myself should reply to the excerpt made by the EXPRESS from W. D. Howells' Article in the Atlantic for June, is responsible for this response. The point, which you well knew would grate most keenly on our feelings—"the unkindest cut of all"—was the one making allusion to "the decay of numbers, which the Shakers confess with so great regret, etc." Instead of having any denial to make of this assertion, we acknowledge the point well taken. It is a truth, that can do us no possible good to deny, that we are not more than half as numerous as we have been in some times past. Nor will we dispute with any that we deeply regret the fact; nor that the decadence which has obtained has been the cause of much discomfiture to the faithful, and of deep discouragement, to which very many weak and faithless minds have succumbed. If Shakerism is dependent upon a steady increase of numbers, it was a decided failure many years ago. But its principles are just as correct to-day, with its 2,500 adherents, as when 4,000 believed, or as when more or less shall embrace their practice. Being dependent upon those outside our institutions for our increase—upon those who have consciences in their souls, and sufficient stamina of both soul and body, to obey their consciences—we are numerically small, and who is to blame? As Howells says: "I cannot think of one's being a Shaker on any other terms except, of course, a sincere conviction." And he is correct. But the vast majority who have applied for admission and trial, have been those whose conviction is summed up in those seven noted principles, "five loaves, and two fishes!" The regeneration or new creation which we teach of, decidedly requires that men and women should be made right the first time—before they come to our practice. While even the most successful and best of us find that we were made none too well to adopt Shaker principles easily, more than ninety-nine in every hundred that we have labored and sweat over, were those whom we have almost thought even the Almighty would have given up in despair! Like unto a great draught of fishes, a hundred to one have been lampreys; that, unfit for use in our temple, were thrown back into the sea, "whose waters cast up mire and dirt." And we admit the outlook still dubious; for only as fast as you worldly-minded people come to be sufficiently self-denying and spiritual, will Shakerism enjoy flourishing members. And if we, as Shakers, become extinct, the barometrical light of spirituality in the outré terre will know no significance whatever, as "the salt" will all be gone! Now, gentlemen, let it be understood that our institutions are made for our better convenience in being Christians; while we are not made for our institutions. When God questions us and others, He will not ask whether we came from this or that institution; whether we were Shakers, Quakers, Methodists, Catholics, Mohammedans, etc., etc., but He will ask us, "What kind of lives have you lived?" and "How nearly do they accord with the best known principles of active, practical Christianity?" Our names and institutions are man-made; and if these or other appendages assist us in being better men or women, God be praised; but in religion, nothing is worthy of our special attention but the practical in Christ, regardless of sectarian terms. We close by saying that Howells' article is good, perhaps too good, as it gives a lustre that we, as a people, are not worthy of, and some of which might be dispelled by active associations; but he appears honest, "almost persuaded," and worthy of thanks from us and all interested. I am, etc.,

G. A. LOMAS.

SHAKERS, May 20.

CRITICISM ON THE ABOVE.

MY DEAR G. A. L.—Last night an Albany Express, containing your letter on "SHAKER VILLAGE," in "Atlantic," came to hand. Many thanks for such favors. Elder John Whiteley was very much pleased with it; and I was too, excepting the lack of lustre which you infer therein, and which Howells felt impressed to give us. This Society is the smallest in our Israel, yet I can point to more than a dozen, who shine with more lustre, even in the dark of these days, than any measure of jewels that could be procured!

One branch of my life is devoted to the cause, that will make the true and single-hearted, even though the least, "to shine!" Don't let us say, "perhaps too good;" or think about a lack of lustre; but rather of a burnishing up. If we do so with a will, there will be lustre enough. Permit me, to think our honored friend, Howells, did not over-estimate the brightness which rests on Shirley. And may he, when visiting Shakers, N. Y., and other societies, find you all luminous—earnestly engaged in manifesting a divine humanity, free from the earthliness of lower self-hood. Let us celebrate the "Centennial" by a general shining forth of purity of life, and the reign of universal peace and good will—at home and abroad.

Yours,

DANIEL FRAZER.

SHIRLEY VILLAGE, May 30, 1876.

GRATITUDE.

For every blessing I receive —
For every gift that comes from heaven —
For every ill which I relieve,
And every smile that's to me given,
I would give thanks.

For precious love, unspoken by word —
For each endearment understood —
For music of the soul, yet heard,
And growth of a continual good,
Thanks, more than thanks.

And while amid these silent meads,
My home must be upon the sod,
While my humanity has needs
Which seek supplies from thee, my God —
Oh, fail me not the blissful thrill —
A brother's cheer, a sister's love —
With these my soul has measured ill;
Without them there's to me no God! ☆

OUR DELEGATE. We were pleased beyond measure to read in the Voice of Peace that Elder F. W. Evans, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., had been selected delegate to, and one of the Vice-Presidents of the Centennial Peace Convention in Philadelphia beginning July 10. This was a most fitting selection. We congratulate all who will be fortunate enough to hear what "the Spirit" shall impress him to utter in behalf of Peace and against the barbarisms of any people barbaric enough to learn and practice war. ☆

VINDICATION OF SHAKER SOCIAL BEAUTIES.

[The following extracts are taken from a private letter, written by Eunice Bathrick, of Harvard, Mass., to the writer of the article entitled: "SOCIAL BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIAN COMMUNISM" in MAY NO. of THE SHAKER. Coming from one advanced in years, and a thorough Shaker, the remarks have especial value. Ed.]

"I often feel while reading THE SHAKER (which I do with much pleasure), that there is something needed to give more sunshine to Shaker life — to portray in brighter and more glowing colors the beauty of the gains of full consecration. You say: 'Living in the spirit of our gospel testimony, we necessarily renounce many practices which bring pleasure to the worldly mind, and embrace those elements which produce the joys of heaven in our present, social lives, etc.'

"Now, do not all, who make a full consecration of 'soul, body and spirit,' — who have, or are daily divesting themselves of every discordant element, enjoy heaven here? Have not such, a living spring within — a fountain constantly gushing forth sweet waters to supply thirsty and famishing souls?

"If so, let us publish it to the world — let them know that we are "happy and free" — that we have not to wait till we cross the dividing line to taste the joys of a heavenly existence. Let them know that we have formed, or are forming, a heaven within.

"To present the idea to those not of our body, that all present comforts and enjoyments are to be sacrificed, in pursuit of future happiness, must look gloomy and uninviting to them. But once picture to their imaginations the real joy that is to be derived from a life of full consecration to God in this state of existence, with the assurance of never-ending felicity in the future, and they will not be so reluctant to make the required sacrifice; they will see they have only to make an exchange of perishable pleasures for the more exalted and durable.

"While sowing the good seed, let the soil be warmed by love from consecrated hearts — from resurrected souls, illumined by the millennial sun, whose rays will cause the seed to germinate, spring up, bud, blossom, and bear fruits acceptable to God. Love is all conquering; it gives light and life to benighted pilgrims, and by its magnetic power, attracts them to a more elevated state of existence, where they can daily be rising into a pure, ethereal atmosphere. This is what is needed to-day — a greater degree of the Christ-love, to warm into action souls now sleeping in sin, who heed not their condition. Without this divine element all else will fail to draw, and hold individuals in the courts of Zion. It has been my aim from early life, to make the way pleasant, not only to my young companions, but to all with whom I converse; for, having tasted the sweets of a virgin life, I am anxious to have others enjoy the same; and as I advance in this soul-refining work this desire increases. I have no doubts of the success of our Cause in the end; for I see God working through His agents, preparing souls for the millennial harvest. May we all stand ready for whatever work the Father has for us, when his time arrives. I think, as you have observed, that any useful knowledge which Believers have attained, either in the domestic concerns of life, or otherwise, should be noticed in our paper, as many may be benefited thereby. Any improvement is worthy of circulation.

"Your sister in true progression,
"EUNICE BATHRICK."

A SHAKER VILLAGE.

[The following extracts are from the pen of W. D. Howells, and have particular reference to Shirley village, Mass. We have endeavored to make them more generally interesting by excluding such matter as does not apply to every "Shaker Village" in our land; at the same time we congratulate Shirley on its success in captivizing such an illustrious chronicler. Ed.]

(From the Atlantic Monthly.)

It was our fortune to spend six weeks of last summer in the neighborhood of a community of the people called Shakers — who are chiefly known to the world outside by their apple-sauce, by their garden seeds so punctual in coming up when planted, by their brooms so well made that they sweep clean long after the ordinary new broom of proverb has retired upon its reputation, by the quaintness of their dress, and by the fame of their religious dances. It is well to have one's name such a synonym for honesty that any thing called by it may be bought and sold with perfect confidence, and it is surely no harm to be noted for dressing out of the present fashion, or for dancing before the Lord. But when our summer had come to an end, and we had learned to know the Shakers for so many other qualities, we grew almost to resent their superficial renown among men. We saw in them a sect simple, sincere, and fervently persuaded of the truth of their doctrine, striving for the realization of a heavenly ideal upon earth; and amidst the hard and often sordid commonplace of our ordinary country life, their practice of the austerities to which men and women have devoted themselves in storied times and picturesque lands clothed these Yankee Shakers in something of the pathetic interest which always elings to our thoughts of monks and nuns.

Their doctrine has been so often explained that I need not dwell upon it here, but the more curious reader may turn to the volumes of the Atlantic Monthly of 1867 for an authoritative statement of all its points in the autobiography of Elder Evans of Mt. Lebanon. Mainly, their faith is their life; a life of charity, of labor, of celibacy, which they call the angelic life. Theologically, it can be most succinctly presented in their formula, Christ Jesus and Christ Ann, their belief being that the order of special prophecy was completed by the inspiration of Mother Ann Lee, the wife of the English blacksmith, Stanley. She is their second Christ; their divine mother, whom some of their hymns invoke, and for whom they cherish a filial love. The families of Shirley and Harvard, Massachusetts, were formed in her time, near the close of the last century; at the latter place they show the room in which she lived, and whence she was once dragged by the foolish mob which helps to found every new religion.

In regard to other points their minds vary. Generally they do not believe in the miraculous birth or divinity of Christ; he was a divinely good and perfect man, and any of us may become divine by being godlike. Generally, also, I should say that they reject the Puritanic ideas of future rewards and punishments, and accept something like the Swedenborgian notion of the life hereafter. They are all spiritualists, recognizing a succession of inspirations from the earliest times down to our own, when they claim to have been the first spiritual mediums. Five or six years before the spirits who have since animated so many table-legs, planchettes, phantom shapes, and what not began to knock at Rochester, the Shaker families in New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, and elsewhere were in full communion with the other world, and they were warned of the impending invasion of the world's parlor and dining-room sets. They feel by no means honored, however, by all the results. But they believe that the intercourse between the worlds can be rescued from the evil influences which have perverted it, and they have signs, they say, of an early renewal of the manifestations among themselves. In some ways these have in fact never ceased. Many of the Shaker hymns, words and music, are directly inspirational, coming to this brother or that sister without regard to his or her special genius; they are sung and written down, and are then brought into general use. The poetry is like that which the other world usually furnishes through its agents in this, hardly up to our literary standard; but the music has always something strangely wild, sweet and naive.

The Shakers claim to be the purest and most Christian church, proceeding in a straight succession from the church which Christ's life of charity and celibacy established on earth; whereas, all the other churches are sprung from the first Gentile churches, to whose weakness and willfulness certain regrettable things, as slavery, war, private property, and marriage, were permitted. Acknowledging a measure of inspiration in all religions, they also recognize a kindred attraction to the angelic life in the celibate orders of every faith: the Roman vestals, the Peruvian virgins of the sun, and the Buddhist bonzes, as well as the monks and nuns of the Catholic church. They complain that they have not been understood by such alien writers as have treated of them, and have represented them as chiefly useful in furnishing homes for helpless and destitute people of all ages and sexes. In the words of Elder Frazer, of Shirley, the Shakers claim that their system is "based on the fact that each man has in himself a higher and a lower life," and that Shakerism "is a manifestation of the higher to the exclusion of the lower life. Its object is to gather into one fold all who have risen above their natural propensities," and they think with Paul that though those who marry do well, yet those who do not marry do better. Their preaching and teaching is largely to this effect; and yet I do not find it quite strange that friends from the world outside regard rather the spectacle of the Shakers' peaceful life, and think mostly of their quiet homes as refuges for those disabled against fate, the poor, the bruised, the hopeless; after all, Christ himself is but this. As I recall their plain, quaint village at Shirley, a sense of its exceeding peace fills me; I see its long, straight street, with the severely simple edifices on either hand; the gardens up-hill on one side and down-hill on the other; its fragrant orchards and its levels of clovery meadow-land stretching away to buckwheat fields, at the borders of whose milky bloom the bee paused, puzzled which sweet to choose; and it seems to me that one whom the world could flatter no more, one broken

In hope, or health, or fortune, could not do better than come hither and meekly ask to be taken into that quiet fold, and kept forever from bittersows and himself. But—such is the hardness of the natural heart—I cannot think of one's being a Shaker on any other terms, except, of course, a sincere conviction.

* * * * *

We stopped at the office of the Church Family, which is a large brick house, scrupulously plain, like all the rest, and appointed for the transaction of business and the entertainment of visitors. Here three sisters and one brother are in charge, and here are chambers for visitors staying overnight. The Shakers do not keep a public house, and are far from inviting custom, but their theory of Christianity forbids them to turn away one unhoused or unfed from their doors; the rich pay a moderate charge, and the poor nothing—as that large and flourishing order of fellow-citizens, the tramps, very well know. These overripe fruits of our labor system lurk about in the woods and byways, and turn up at the Shakers' doors after dark, where they are secure of being fed and sheltered in the little dormitory set apart for them. "And some of them," said Elder Frazer, "really look as if the pit had vomited them up."

* * * * *

One has somehow the impression that the young people of the Shakers are held in compulsory allegiance, but of course this is not at all the fact. As soon as they are old enough to take care of themselves they are entirely free to go or to stay. Undoubtedly they are constantly taught the advantages of the community over the world, and the superior merit of the virgin life over the married state, which they may be inclined to think of as they grow to be men and women. Marriage is not held to be sinful or dishonorable. "Few things," said one of the elders, "are more pleasing to us than the sight of a happy young couple living rightly in their order," but marriage is earthly and human, and celibacy is divine; as the thoughts are turned to higher things, they forsake husband or wife. Nevertheless, if their young women will marry, the Shakers claim the satisfaction of thinking that they have received in the community the best possible training for wives and mothers—that they have been taught diligence, economy, and all branches of domestic knowledge. More than once there have been secessions of young people, which are nearly always stealthy, not because there could be any constraint, but because they hated to face the disappointed hopes of their elders. In after years, these delinquents from the angelic condition sometimes return to thank their benefactors, and to declare that they owe most of their worldly prosperity to their unworldly precepts. The proportion of those reared in Shakerism whom the Shakers expect to keep is small; they can count quite as much for their increase upon accessions of mature men and women from outside, whom the Shaker life and doctrine persuade. These they invite now, as always, very cordially to join them, and they look forward to a time when their dwindling communities shall be restored to more than their old numbers.

One bad effect of the present decrease, which all thoughtful Shakers deplore, is the employment of hired labor. This, as communists, they feel to be wrong; but they are loath either to alienate their land or to let it lie idle. A strange and sad state of things results: the most profitable crop that they can now raise is timber, which they harvest once in thirty years, and which it cost nothing to cultivate, whereas it costs more to plant and reap the ordinary farm crops, at the present rate of farm labor, than the crops will sell for.

* * * * *

The decay of numbers, then, which the Shakers confess with so great regret, is but their share of the common blight, and how to arrest it is their share of the common perplexity. I could not encourage Elder Frazer to indulge great hopes, when one day in a burst of zeal for Shakerism he said, "We want cultivated people—half the subscribers of the Atlantic Monthly—to come and fill up our vacant ranks."

* * * * *

We often touched upon this subject of the decay of Shakerism, which they face bravely, and not unhopefully, and yet with a care concerning it that was not less than touching. What could it matter to those childless men and women whether any like them should inherit them in this world, to which, while living, they had turned so cold a shoulder? Very little indeed, one would have said, and yet they were clearly anxious that Shakerism should flourish after them. Their anxiety was not so unnatural; none of us can bear to think of leaving the fruits of our long endeavor to chance and the stranger. But I may attribute the largest share of the Shaker reluctance to perish from the earth to zeal for the perpetuation of the true faith—faith which was founded, like all others, in persecution, built up amidst ridicule and obloquy, and now, when its practical expression is received with respect by all the neighboring world, is in some danger of ceasing among men, not through the indifference of believers, but through their inevitable mortal decay. There are several reasons for the present decrease, besides that decrease of the whole rural population which I have mentioned.

* * * * *

Whatever it was, it was a time when men's minds turned fervidly from the hard work-days of this world to the Sabbaths of another; from the winter, the wilderness, the privation of New England, to the eternal summer and glory and fruition of the New Jerusalem. How to get there was their care; it was for this that wives and husbands rent themselves asunder, and shared their children with strangers; it was for this that the lover left his love, and the young girl forbade her heart's yearning; we may be sure that it was zeal for heaven, for the imagined service of God, that built up the Shaker communities.

Their peculiar dress remembers the now quaint days of their origin; it is not a costume invented or assumed by them; it is the American dress of a hundred years ago, as our rustic great-grandparents wore it, with such changes as convenience, not fashion, has suggested to the Shakers since. With all its quaintness it has a charm which equally appears whether it is worn by old or by young. To the old, the modest soberness of the colors, the white kerchief crossed upon the breast, the clean stiff cap, were singularly becoming; and the young had in their simple white Sunday dresses a look of maidenly purity which is after all the fine-t ornament. The colors we noticed at meeting were for the young mostly white, for the middle-aged and elderly the subdued tints of drab, bronzed, and lead-color, which also prevailed with the men of all ages. Both sexes wear collars that cover the whole neck, and both eschew the vanity of neck-ties; some of the brothers suffered themselves the gaiety of showing at the ends of their trousers-legs the brighter selva of the cloth; if indeed this was a gaiety, and not, as one clothed in the world's taste might have accounted it, an added mortification of the spirit.

The Shakers used to spin and weave all the stuff they wore, but to do this now would be a waste of time; they buy the alpaca and linen which both sexes wear in summer, and their substantial woollens for the winter. Some relics of their former skill and taste remain in the handsome counterpanes in their guest-chambers at the office, which were dyed, spun, and woven in the family, and the sisters are still skilled in braiding palm-leaf hats and in the old-fashioned art of hooking rugs. But I would not persuade the reader that any Shaker family is otherwise a school of art; one painting I did indeed see, a vigorous sketch in oil of a Durham bull, but this was nailed to the side of a stall far up in the vast gray barn. It was the work of a boy who was in the family years ago; but he never became a Shaker. It would be interesting to know what he did become.

In a community it must be that the individual genius is largely sacrificed to the common purpose and tendency, and yet I believe that among the Shakers the sacrifice is compelled only by the private conscience. So it is with regard to every thing. On joining the community the new member gives up nothing, and is cautioned against a too early surrender of his property. He wears, so long as he likes, the fashions of the world, but these make him look as odd in the family as the Shaker dress would outside of it, and he is commonly anxious to assume the garb of simplicity before his mundane clothing is worn out. After due time he may give his property to the family; if he ever leaves it, he receives back the principal of his contribution without interest; for his labor he has already received his support. There are no formalities observed when a new brother or sister comes among the Shakers. It is understood that they are to go as freely as they have come; and this provision is recalled, as a rule that works both ways, to the mind of any brother whose room is finally found to be better than his company. But this very rarely happens; in twenty-five years Minister Whiteley had been obliged to dismiss only one undesirable brother.

The whole polity of the family is very simple. Its affairs are conducted by trustees, who hold the property and handle the funds, and to whom any member goes for money to purchase things not provided for the common use. Reasonable requests of this sort are readily allowed; but it is easy to understand how the indulgence of even very simple private tastes adds to the cost of common living, already enhanced by the decrease of members, and the necessity of keeping in repair the buildings left only partially occupied.

* * * * *

At the head of each family there is an elder and an eldress, to whom all complaints are first addressed, and by whom difficulties are settled. I believe there is also a species of confessional, in which those who desire can confide their repentance and good intentions to the elders. Disputes in which the decision of the elders is not satisfactory are appealed to the ministers, whose mind is final in such matters.

* * * * *

Of course, nothing like ceremony must be inferred concerning the expression of this regard. They, and all the other brothers and sisters, are addressed by their first names, and it is liked that strangers in addressing the Shakers should be simple and direct, eschewing the forms and titles which could not be accorded in return.

* * * * *

They are plain and homely in their phrase, but they are very courteous, and it is impossible to know them and not perceive how little politeness consists in the tedious palaver that commonly passes by that name. Their sincerity gives them dignity and repose; it appears that you have but to renounce the world, and you cannot be afraid of it.

I should be sorry to give the notion of a gloomy asceticism in the Shaker life. I saw nothing of this, though I saw self-restraint, discipline, quiet, and heard sober, considered, conscientious speech. They had their jesting, also; and those brothers and sisters who were of a humorous mind seemed all the better liked for their gift of laughing and making laugh. The sum of Shaker asceticism is this: they neither marry nor give in marriage; but this is a good deal. Certain things they would think indecorous rather than wicked, and I do not suppose a Shaker would go twice to the opera bouffe; but such an entertainment as a lecture by our right-hearted humorist, Mark Twain, had been attended by one of the brethren not only without self-reproach, but with great enjoyment. They had also some of them read Mr. Bret Harte's books without apparent fear of the consequences. They are rather strict in the observance of the Sabbath, but not so much, I thought, from conscience as from custom.

Our Shaker friends are sometimes embarrassed by visitors who ask to be shown all over their buildings, forgetting that their houses are private houses; and I cannot promise the curious reader visiting Shirley a repetition of the favors done us, whom the Shakers were good enough to show all of their communal life that one could see. In each village is an edifice known as the Dwelling-House, which is separate from the office and other buildings. In this are the rooms of the brothers and sisters, the kitchen and dining-room, and a large room for family meetings. The first impression of all is cleanliness, with a suggestion of bareness which is not inconsistent, however, with comfort, and which comes chiefly from the aspect of the unpapered walls, the scrubbed floors hidden only by rugs and strips of carpeting, and the plain flat finish of the wood-work. Each chamber accommodates two brothers or two sisters, and is appointed with two beds, two rocking-chairs, two wash-stands and a wood-stove, with abundance of rings. The rooms of the younger people are above so that (as was explained to us) if the young sisters, especially, wish to talk after they go to bed they need not disturb their elders. There were few tokens of personal taste in the arrangement of the rooms; the most decided expression of character was that of the nonagenarian who required his bed to be made up with a hollow in the middle from top to bottom, which he called his trough, and which he strictly forbade any one to meddle with; that was all he asked of earth after ninety-six years, not to disturb his trough. It seemed right that the simple demand should be indulged.

The dining-room was provided with two large tables, at one of which the brothers sat, and at the other the sisters. The monastic rule of silence at meals is observed because, as we were told, the confusion would be too great if all talked together. In the kitchen was an immense cook-stove, with every housekeeping convenience; and everywhere opened pantry and store-room doors, with capacious cellars underneath—all scoured and scrubbed to the last degree of neatness.

The family ménage is completed by a wash-house and a dairy-house; there is an infirmary, and a shop for women's work, and under the same roof with the latter, at Shirley, a large school-room, in which the children of the community are taught the usual English branches by a sister. The Shaker village forms a school district, and their school is under the control of the town committee.

One day, toward the end of our sojourn, the office-sisters asked us to spend an afternoon and take tea with them. After tea we sat down in the office-parlor, and the best singers of the family came in with their music books, and sang those tunes which we had severally liked most. It was all done with the friendliest simplicity, and we could not but be charmed.

READING SEALED LETTERS.

—o—

There is so much of humming connected with modern spiritualism, that we cannot censure any for being wary concerning it. But what can we think of the following? When Elder Evans and company were in New York, holding a series of meetings, they called, by invitation, upon Dr. J. V. Mansfield, 361 Sixth avenue, New York. The various tests made by them, and as narrated to us by Eldress A. Doolittle, were simply, yet pleasantly astounding. We wrote the doctor that we wanted to make an honorable, but very severe, test. The challenge was invitingly accepted. A noble friend of ours wrote the letter (or we supposed he did) upon paper glazed with blue on the outer side. Especial pains were taken in folding up every line, sealing the same, before writing another line, and fastening the ends with the utmost care and glue. I took the letter, sealed it in a double envelope, making every necessary private mark to prevent exposure possible without my knowledge, and sent it. To my own and friend's surprise, the sealed letter was returned undisturbed, with an answer for his wife, who, unknown to me, had addressed her spirit mother!

The answer made references to matters known only to my friend's private family. If Elder H. L. Eades will logically explain how this is done, we will next ask him to satisfy us by elucidating the materializations mentioned in the first fourteen verses of Ezekiel, chapter 37. ☆

BOOK NOTICES.

—o—

RELATIONS OF THE SEXES: By Mrs. E. B. Duffy. Wood & Holbrook, N. Y. This is a bold movement in the right direction, by a brave, high principled woman. She writes plainly upon the theme she has chosen. She will thereby awaken the progenitors of the race to see their duty to themselves and to those whom they would give and have given existence. She visits thunderbolts on the heads of those engaged in sexual abuses, and upon the various apologies rendered therefor; and if warning was sufficient to make the change that nature demands, we might feel better. But, like nearly all writers upon this subject, the authoress grows weak, even to supineness, when attempting substitutes for and preventives of marital distresses. We boldly and forcibly urge the laws of Moses on all generative men and women, as their only hope. While to those good enough to compare well in their generations with the beasts of the field, we recommend the superior life, and angelic career of Jesus—the Christ—if they would be Christians.

THE NORTH STAR AND THE SOUTHERN CROSS: By M. Weppner. Weed, Parsons & Co., Albany, N. Y. This is the journey of a woman round the world, and is written with an ability that has made two very interesting volumes. She writes as only a woman can upon subjects, persons and customs of nations, which would be lost sight of by manly travelers; and thus the work will please the feminine idea of what a journey round the world should treat of. As the guest of very distinguished persons in other lands than ours, she is made much of, and tells her stories of individuals who used her handsomely or abused her inhospitably, with a keen kindness and rich deserving. Compared with the volumes of Seward, Peebles and others, it stands good.

We speak for it a ready and extensive sale.

THE copious extracts which we have transferred from the columns of the Atlantic Monthly to this number of THE SHAKER, will prove very interesting to all having any sympathy with, or curiosity about us as a people. Although so lengthy, and necessarily crowding out several very excellent articles from good Bros. Peebles, Russell, Fraser, Leggett, and some from equally good sisters, yet we believe we shall be thanked for the space used, while we promise the "excellent articles" in our next.

For the same reason we offer apology for the absence of our "Spirit of the Farm," and "Useful Receipts" departments. Our farm notes, we learn from many letters, are appreciated; and we return many thanks for the congratulations tendered us, in that our "SHAKER" is filled with choice variety, and very interesting. "I have read every word of June number," writes a Sonyea friend, "and consider it the best." Another from Worcester, Mass., says: "Although I take a multitude of papers, THE SHAKER is the only one that I read from beginning to end." We tally one for every such conclusion. Thank you, friends, one and all. G. A. L.

ESTIMATION OF CHARACTER.

—O—

MATILDA A. BUTLER.

It is quite too common for us to pass judgment, with a freedom unbecoming, on our confiding brother, sister or friend, we not seeing the living springs of their hearts, nor hearing the reasonings of their minds' inner depths. "In olden times, justice was meted out by the sword, the spear avenged the wrong, and the lot decided the right." The condemning waters still roll, and we wait not to see what the end will be, but determine the right or the wrong, by the issue of failure or success. "Count no one more evil because he is unfortunate;" for the blessing of a better heart does not always lie in the sunshine of prosperity. Chastisement, not less than reward, proves the good Father's love to his children. In looking at our fellow beings, we say, who can pass righteous judgment? such an one is holy and accepted, and such an one is reprobate and doomed; there is so much of good among the worst, and so much of evil in the best, that looking a little deeper than the surface, it is hard to pronounce one a saint, and condemn another as a sinner.

Our character is the complex of all that we love, and we never love any truth or make it our own to live by, until our affections are first fastened upon it. The love that is so strong, can be no superficial sentiment, but an inward element of the heart. Admitting love to be an intense and all-pervading power, the very life of our souls, the importance of training ourselves to love only that which is pure and true, at once becomes manifest. And so long as we are at liberty to take care of our own character, and grow it to the highest principles of truth and virtue, we are not dependent on reputation, which is a kind of earth robe, and like the leaves of the tree, worn only in suitable seasons.

"Character, not death, is the end of life."

We die not, all our deeds remain, to crown with honor or to mar with shame. Our character is just what we make it; our reputation is made by others for us, and is always liable to discount, if not entirely counterfeit. True it is, accidents may modify, circumstances may control, externals may change it, but still it is the same; the map of the face and picture of the eye are traced by the pen of passion.

A knowledge of ourselves gives us power; in the exercise of this we consider our failings, search out our latent virtues, cultivate the good and crush out the evil. Ignorance of self is the symbol of idolatry, while a love for the upright and noble will cause us to stand up and battle valiantly for the truth, fearless of ridicule, for this is a weak weapon when leveled at a strong mind. It takes years of untiring zeal to grow into the genuine characteristics of the higher life. "Science may be learned by rote." Wisdom can only be learned by experience," and it is sad to reflect that "experience" is only an elegant term for suffering! In the great battle of life its triumphs rarely compensate for the wounds they inflict, still it is a battle that must be fought, and the winning is worth the sacrifice. No one ever attained the heights of virtue without a bold, daring spirit of love for self; for no one ever did a noble deed that did not truly love self. We cannot truly love humanity unless we love ourselves enough to find out in what elements the fruits of good will grow most prolific; and here is the field inviting our superior love of self. Character grows, or is formed of all our little deeds; every act of our lives has a meaning, as every word in the dictionary has a definition. Then let us walk together as friends, giving the hand of fellowship, acknowledging the heart of sympathy, and let not charity be a stranger at the board that is spread for our brother or sister. Let us rise to nobler themes, for the soul hath an heritage of glory, in the majestic character of God.

Union Village, O.

CENTENNIAL SMOKE.

—O—

RICHARD FLETCHER.

THE exhibition at Philadelphia affords opportunity for useful moralizing. Since editors have become constant preachers, church attendance is falling off; people read daily sermons and do not go to sleep over them so much, because they call them "editorials." A wide range of illustrations for "texts," is open in the accounts of the present World's Fair. Near Memorial Hall is a beautiful work of art in bronze. It represents a large mortar, used in national, wholesale murders. By the side of the mortar is "an old tar," body bent forward, pointing with full stretched arm to the far distance. On the other side stands an officer in full uniform, telescope in one hand, while the other rests on the rim of the mortar, also watching the effects of the deadly missile, evidently just fired. The group is completed by the figure of a lad, in naval uniform, who has sprung upon the mortar feet hanging across its mouth, shading his eyes with one hand as from the powder smoke. The writer adds that the smoke, although it could not be pictured in bronze, can easily be imagined hanging around, so life-like is the whole expression.

Ah! there is indeed much smoke about such an object, and about many popular customs and systems of society—smoke that hides truth, and needs clearing away. Look at the text again: however skillfully that bronze work has been done, it is a wrong use of art, nothing beautiful or interesting about it to right thinking persons. The artist has worked out sickly ideas of scenes, shocking to common kindness, which all men shrink from taking part in until goaded to a species of madness, simply because false education makes a market among the people for his work. The real actors in such a scene, hidden by smoke, deafened by the thunder of human hatred, sickened by cruel sights, take little relish in telling over details of their worst deeds, much less in bronzing memory's worst pictures and their consciences at the same time, by "works of art" that hide what little love of God there is left in human hearts. If this nation shall live to see its second Centennial, such relics as the exhibits of fire-arms with all the machinery for making murderous weapons, will be looked upon as we look upon an old flint-lock musket of 1776, or upon a hand spinning wheel.

And now, if the metal were only the right kind, that casting would look much better in form of plough-shares; although if it is much like the delicate artist, the material is too poor to honestly turn a furrow.

Why is it a wrong use of art? Because its only result is to harrow up natural sympathy into ragged sorrows, useless, as well as cruel—and about a black, sulphurous smoky business which nations have all to repent of and forget—the sooner, the easier and cheaper.

"I will break the bow and the sword, and the battle out of the earth" (Hosea, 2: 18). Would it not be more truthful, in describing the naval group, to say the sailor has a savage scowl, the officer puts on a terrible squint, the youth looks distressed for want of fresh air, and from the entire expression, all their eager, interested, "artistic" manner would be changed to cursing, if that shot should fail in its deadly errand? Those metal figures mean nothing if they do not mean interest in destruction, and of what? of property not only, but of human life! Such interesting feelings can only come from worse than metal hearts, and iron grip of deadly passion.

Now, the very fact that such ideas as the above find crowds of admirers, that sad fact is the moral of this article. Pulpit religion befores large crowds, who pay preachers to expose soul-truths as much as is consistent with popular tastes, and no more. May "THE SHAKER" keep on clearing away the smoke of human lusts. Of course, those who live in a city do not realize the heavy vapors which outsiders can see settling down like a cloud, hiding the sunlight more or less at all times. So those who breathe the clear wholesome air of sexual purity, do not think but know that false views of our society are held by the citizens of the "old earth" on the plane of the first Adam all in the smoke of their own lusts.

Indistinct murmurs arise from their murky valley of delusion about the higher plane. Shall it draw us lower, or shall we not rather strive to shed a brighter light from the highest hill-tops? However much, nations, sects, families differ, they all agree in the worship of one, likened to a "beast" in prophecy. Nothing muddles preachers, politicians, collegians, workers and idlers, quicker than fluttery of the most corrupt part of our common human nature. No matter how, whether by costly painting, brilliant writings, almanac wit, coarse slang, or polished pulpit smut, the god of this world brings all classes to one level, groveling in the mud of their earthly natures. They seem to cry, "Great is the universal object of our desires!" Let people murder one another by wholesale, and call it glorious war, let foolish fashions blind our common sense, but let not one single soul refuse to crawl to the lowest level! Strange that they cannot see the beauty of living equal, as with consecrated property and equality of sexes!

Perhaps, from the level of the "old Adam" plane, Christians (so-called) cannot grasp the idea of a truly spiritual life, nor realize the wholesome love among brothers and sisters in Christ, although they often hear from their pulpits: "In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels in heaven." What smoky glasses people look through to see beauty in fashionable dress! Plainly dressed people look so much more healthy and honest by very contrast, that the "stylish" ones, especially the women, look as though they were trying to hide the twisted, distorted souls within; and they bid fair, before many years, to sin humanity out of its last traces of physical beauty.

NO.

E. T. LEGGETT.

How many a hell or a Heaven below,
Is made by that wonderful arbiter No!
Weird child of the doom is that magical word;
Fate bows in submission wherever 'tis heard:
How many a soul going lost to the grave,
A heart-uttered No would inspirit and save!
How many of desolate hearth-stones there are,
This champion word of our language would spare!

How little this word, yet a monarch in might!
Just born of a breath and a child of the light;
How Godlike in meaning! how trenchant and brave!

How potent to shield and how mighty to save!
The wealth of the Indies in diamonds and gold,
The fame that encircles the brows of the bold,
How powerless they to protect us below,
Compared to that mighty magician, a No!

How many a hero of field or the flood,
With 'scutcheon red-written in letters of blood,
That, dauntless, would charge all the furies below,
Yet hesitates, falters, recoils from a No!
Thus Eve was beguiled in lost Eden and fell,
When Satan wove round her his mystical spell;
Her lips faltered yes, while her heart beating low,
In vain sought for courage to utter a No.

What folly in hoarding the world-worshipped ore,
Or delving in darkness for mystical lore;
Or seeking high up in the temple of fame,
With heroes and martyrs to blazen our name,
While lacking that jewel, more precious and rare,
Our spirit's sheet anchor, the courage to dare
To utter, when sin is enticing below,
No half-hearted yes, but a whole-hearted No!

If God does not accept our earnestness, wanting as it oftentimes does the necessary liberality, let us learn the lesson. Let us use special care that, in consequence, we do not become luke warm and indifferent to eternal interests of our own, and others' souls.

LOMAS.

FLOWERS.

—O—

G. B. AVERY.

THAT Creative Providence made flowers beautiful, and made the eye with capacity to drink in their beauty to contribute to the happiness of his creatures, there is no room to doubt. The poet has truly said, "A thing of beauty, is a joy forever." And, in a true life, the useful and the beautiful are combined. The beautiful is useful, yet in what sense, and to what extent? A true, Christian, godly life, is devoted to the most important uses.

Were the entire time of human society devoted to the culture of flowers only, where were the fruits of the earth to sustain life? Were the pioneer settlers in a new country to give much time to the culture of flowers, they would perish with hunger, cold and nakedness, nor could they spend much time or strength to construct the merely ornamental in dress or architecture. The most important uses must necessarily engage their attention, time and strength.

In this age, the burdens and duties of the Christ life may justly be compared to those of the pioneer settlers in the wilderness; and, to cut down the gigantic forests of human errors, and clear the soil of human society for the planting and culture of those goodly trees bearing the precious flowers and succeeding fruits essential to the strength and sustenance of a godly life, is primarily the duty and burden of the Christian; little is the opportunity to such of cultivating those earthly flowers which contribute their share of bliss to life, only in feeding the desires for earth's beauties. Jesus—the first Christian—enunciated the great truthful principle, "The life is more than meat, and the body more than raiment." Yet, without meat and raiment, what would become of the body? But, all necessary duties should be attended to in the order of their importance; and those persons called to the highest duties of life,—to such numerous and onerous burdens as to engage all their strength, needing, besides, the strength of myriads more, cannot be justified in spending much of their precious life to mere pleasure; they must be largely utilitarian.

To them, Jesus' injunction was, "labor not for the meat that perisheth." And, "in those early days" (of christianity even) when the number of the disciples was multiplied, there was a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration. Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them and said: "It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve tables." * * "But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word."

The duty of all the members of the true Christian Church, in this age of the world, is analogous to those of that chosen twelve; they are called to be kings and priests unto God.

We would repeat, all necessary duties should be attended to in the order of their importance. We have known some persons so absorbed in the culture of flowers, they neglected to clean and mend the clothing, and properly prepare the food needed for the family, and to keep clean the house.

Flowers, except those precedent to the fruits needful for human support, are secondary in importance, and those persons called to the highest order of life,—the Christian, to be "Kings and Priests unto God" must toil most largely in the field of fruits, both physically, morally and spiritually considered. Such was the field of toil for Jesus; and, in this day, when his true followers—the ministers of light, life and salvation—are so few, such must largely be the toiling field of his true followers; they must be mostly utilitarian in its boldest and most important sense, rather than in its florid phase.

THE TWO SLATES—A VISION.

—O—

HENRY T. CHILD, M. D.

MY eyes were opened to see men and women spiritually, as they moved about on earth; each one seemed to have two slates, some dark, some light and transparent. One directly in front of them, the other behind. On the front side of the first, in open view, was written the professions which men make, sometimes of religion, sometimes of worldly things, of ambition, etc. I could see that some had many things attached to this, shelves of books, various mottoes, the bible, the creed of their church, so that the world might see all these. The back of this slate was directly in front of their faces, on this they wrote their real conditions, their secret thoughts, generally very different from those on the front slate. They were concealed from the view of others; instead of their professions, their real lives were written upon this side, and it was within the reach, so that they could change or wipe out what they had written. The other slate was just opposite this, and behind them, and so arranged that whatever was written on the front slate was reflected upon this, and though it was not seen by all, my spiritual vision was opened and I was permitted to see these duplicate records. There was a purpose in my seeing these, for it was shown me that while they could put out their hands and wipe off the front slate, they could not reach this. Then I saw a person who was really desirous to have both slates cleansed; he went down into the valley of repentance and taking up the waters therefrom he washed off the front slate clean; then he was obliged to go to some one who was qualified to receive his open confession, and show them just what had been written on his slates, not only this, but he was to have an inward and spiritual baptism of repentance, and then the individual to whom the confession was made could dip a sponge into these baptismal waters of true repentance, and wash off all the slates. I saw that when an individual attempted to rub off the marks on the front slate and was not willing to confess, the marks on the back slate seemed to come out more distinct. I saw how necessary it was for those to whom the confessions were made, to have clean hands, else they might soil the slate with that which was upon them. These slates were representations of the conditions of individuals, and when all the slates were clean and transparent I could read them from every side. I could see that such individuals walked along life's road free, and the angels walked beside them in love. Their lives were an open book to be read by all who had a spiritual vision; and in reading these there was always a blessing, for pure lives are the highest and holiest testimonies; they bring God and heaven to man, and earth and earthly things are swallowed up in heavenly and divine things.

ESTABLISHMENT OF HARMONY.

—O—
THOMAS PAINE.

THE height of development is harmony—a diffusion of ideas, without being met by the spirit of opposition, saying, you can go no farther, for the spirit that stirs up thought is accounted the devil's platform of labor.

When harmony is established, a just judgment of all the elements that afflict and bless man is arrived at; evil takes the negative platform, and goodness is the predominating result of a term of schooling, in all the branches of godly forethought and purpose, to make man a self-reliant and responsible agent, sent out, after repeated changes, to do the work of world-redeeming, becoming like unto Gods, knowing the exact path of duty, and the full and complete law of love.

"One by one fall ancient errors,
Reared by might and propped by wrong,
And earth wonders, when they perish,
That they stood the test so long."

HARMONY.

—O—
WM. H. RUSSELL.

THE term implies a combination of various parts so as to produce the highest and best possible effects in the whole,—as the strings or the keys of a musical instrument, which, together, may be touched so as to produce melody far sweeter than even a Paganini can call forth from a single one; or the orderly inter-volutions of worlds with worlds, and systems with systems, in the universe, where originate the myriads of beings destined to glory and immortality. Our highest idea of harmony is gained by the contemplation of the Divine Mind; and, as a matter of course, we regard the state producing the greatest harmony among human beings and in the individual soul, to be that of the completest union with the Divine Mind.

The fact is evident enough that, at present, there is inharmony everywhere among mankind, and notwithstanding what has been said or sung of paradises and golden ages in the past, yet unpoetic history shows us discord throughout its entire length. But we cannot, because of that, impeach the divine wisdom. Its purposes and plans are perfection itself though man is conscious of imperfection in himself and his surroundings. This very consciousness, however, is proof of harmony somewhere existing; and acts as an impelling power toward its final attainment. All legitimate wants are prophetic of the day of abundance.

Harmony in the individual and in communities, is the result of growth, not merely during the period of a single earthly life, but for ages. This is effected by the inspiration of divine life in the soul, gradually unfolding and perfecting all its powers, and the action of the individual upon the community. Divine love is ever active, though not always in the same manner. Often we fail to recognize it, and call it any thing but what it really is. The temperance movement, the anti-slavery movement, the peace movement, are all styled the works of fanatics until the results of years have shown that God's messengers have actually been in them all, and that a grand advance has been made toward the day of harmony. It is utterly vain for us to ignore the divine methods of action, yet how frequently is the attempt made. "I verily thought within myself I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth," said Paul: "I believed the salvation of the nation depended upon my shooting that tyrant," said the murderer of Lincoln. But the beautiful lessons that Jesus taught are still operative, and are likely to affect the hearts of men in all coming ages. The blow struck at the individual life is of but transient effect, that aimed at wrong produces effects eternal in duration.

Such is the present condition of mankind, it is impossible there should be entire concert of action in any movement having the general welfare as its object. But no matter. For a time, Jesus stood alone. The disciples were but a "little flock," at first. It is not a cause of reproach that some spend the most of their efforts in behalf of the public upon one object, if that be a good one. Sumner was a man of large culture in many respects, yet he was classed by most persons with the men of one idea. This to him was a matter of no concern, nor to many who listened to his powerful utterances, whether before the senate or the assembled people, all tending to one object—the destruction of the slave power. Though error often has numerous adherents, yet truth never has lacked a sufficient number to advance its interests in the world. That is seed which never perishes, however deeply it may be buried in the earth. It will all finally come to the light and the air.

There are some who assert that the efforts of professing Christians are rendered more effective by their division into numerous bodies than if they formed but one. That depends upon what their efforts are tending to. It never yet has been proved that error benefits the world. If all were actually inculcating the same truth there could be no hostilities. A difference in mere organic form might be favorable for different localities and not disturb the essential unity of the spirit. The union resulting from the operation of divine love in the heart, never yet has been fully exhibited by the various sects toward each other, yet it must be admitted by those who have traced their history, that there is a tendency to ultimate harmony, visible at the present time which has not been seen in the past. Less stress is laid upon peculiar dogmas and more upon the active principles which edify. All minds that clearly see the same truths must agree with respect to them, and all hearts governed by divine love must accord. Through the smoke and dust arising from the contentions of political parties light is visible, greater than heretofore has been seen; individual crimes and national vices may seem to some more numerous than ever, but it is only because the light shines more powerfully, revealing such as once lay hidden in darkness. The tendencies toward national amity may not seem remarkably strong, yet no age has equalled the present in that respect. The earth will yet be glad with greatest joy for the glory of universal peace; but the day of perfect harmony lies beyond that, when all the powers of the individual shall be attuned to melody and celestial society, though formed in myriad groups, shall possess nothing that will disturb its endless quiet.

Not from political reasons, but from more reasonable grounds, do we think Gov. S. J. Tilden might be the better president: Being unmarried, he has none but the Lord and the people to serve unselfishly—if he could only really do so. ☆

CENTENNIAL YEAR.

—O—
ELIZABETH H. WEBSTER.

For what shall this year, the centennial, be known,
For what be emblazoned on high?
In the archives of history what laurels be shown,
That never can wither nor die?
What victory gained o'er oppression and wrong,
And all that truth's river dams?
What power to enable each heart to be strong,
What triumph o'er shoddy and shame?

For what shall this year, the centennial, be known,
What record of progress be made?
What noble deeds done like sweet flowers strewn,
To mark this our greatest decade?
Not honor nor riches, not science nor art,
Though shining effulgently bright,
Can make her page white if she still bears a part
In any injustice or slight.

Oh, deed the most worthy, if she could but give
To all of her daughters so brave,
The freedom her sons have, to be and to live,
All true to the life which God gave;
The treasure of freedom our forefathers won,
With a goodly and blessed increase;
A freedom for all, beneath its broad sun,
Each sex and each nation in peace.

RECORD OF A REMARKABLE FAMILY.

—O—

References have been made in THE SHAKER to the remarkable data connected with the Wells' family, and so many quotations have been made from our paper concerning the same, that we would now correctly put on record the birth and death of each member. Eleven of the fourteen died in this Society—Shakers, N. Y.—leaving only the father, and an infant,* as exceptions to this rule. "He liveth long who liveth well;" but it is a fact, whether commune life is commended better or not than the more contracted spheres, that it tends greatly to longevity.

Thomas Wells, born April 27, 1739. Died May 2, 1819.

THE INEVITABLE DISCIPLINE.

—O—
T. S. ARTHUR.

"But, painful though the process be, it is the only one through which the soul can ascend to the high and noble estate for which it was born; and sooner or later, in the infinite goodness that overshadows all, there will come to the life of every man and woman a discipline of sorrow, misfortune or suffering, intended to break the lower, selfish life, so that the soul may turn away from the husks upon which it has been starving, and suffer itself to be led into green pastures and by still waters."

"Alas for the many that will not so be led! For the many who sit down in anger or despair amid the ruin of their hopes, crying after their lost delights!"

"AS A SPIRITUALIST, I BELIEVE."

—o—

AMONG the favorable signs of to-day, indicating liberality in extenso, and the acceptance of spiritual truths, is the fact that the secular press have so freely and fairly devoted space to the recent discourses of our dear friend J. M. Peebles, lately lecturing in the Southern States. The Chattanooga (Tenn.) Commercial is before us, and from it we copy the following beauties, only sorry that we cannot present the address entire. Let us read, and inwardly digest the brave words of a courageous soul:

As a Spiritualist I believe,

In one living and true God—the Infinite Presence of the universe—Wisdom and Love.

I believe in Jesus Christ as teacher, mediator, Saviour, accepting Peter's definition (Acts ii, 22), "Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles, wonders and signs that God did by Him."

I believe in the Holy Spirit—that it fell upon the apostles—was poured out upon the Gentiles, and is a constantly descending afflatus from the Christ Heavens.

I believe in inspiration, a spiritual inflowing from the Divine Fountain. Prophets and apostles, martyrs and poets have been inspired in all ages.

I believe in the beauty of faith, the necessity of repentance, and a just and adequate punishment for all sins in violation of law.

I believe in heaven and hell, as conditions rather than locations. Depraved, selfish spirits suffer the keenest remorse in the lower spheres. "The Kingdom of God is within you," said Jesus.

I believe in spiritual gifts, prophecies, dreams, clairvoyance, visions, trances, and spirit materializations as demonstrating a future conscious existence. In fact this is not belief, but positive knowledge, and thus conditioned, I have obeyed the apostolic injunction, "Add to your faith knowledge."

I believe in a natural and spiritual body, and when death transpires, each individual commences the hereafter life precisely as he left this, mentally and spiritually; but all, there as here, are the subjects of progression.

I believe in trying "the spirits," accepting only such teachings as are pure, holy, spiritual and Christ-like.

I believe in salvation through Divine obedience—through Christ, just as I believe in buds and flowers and harvests through the quickening sunshine.

I believe in the church of God, the church of humanity, the holy apostolic church within whose pale may be found purity and peace, spiritual gifts and "all things in common" as upon the Day of Pentecost. This is the living church of Christ enfolding Believers.

Touching the moral influence of these doctrines the speaker said that if a demonstration of the soul's immortality, the certainty of punishment, the happiness derived from purity, goodness and holiness, the harmony between religion and science, the conscious presence of ministering spirits, and a continuous baptism from the Christ Heavens, would not tend to better the world he could not conceive what would. Add to this, he said, the fact that none have secrets—God, angels, spirits, know them all. Our souls are as the leaflets of open books, and self-denial and purity of life the only passports to heaven.

THE CHEMICAL FORCES OF PLANTS AND ANIMALS. NO. 2.

—o—

DANIEL FRASER.

BRAN is a wonderful article in its power to maintain right conditions for the play of vital chemical affinities. Neither vital nor inorganic affinities can operate except the conditions are right. They are like the spiritual mediums—the conditions must be right, which all who have had spiritual experiences know to be true. Bran has a chemical constitution of its own—has an affinity for, and is retentive of moisture; it protects the grain from being parched in the soil, and when in the intestines, true to its character, is retent-ive of moisture there. And from its demulcent nature, facilitates transmission, and from its bulk distends, keeps open the absorbents and lacteals, and normally excites the muscularity of the intestines.

Food lubricated with saliva descends into the stomach, and remains there for hours enveloped in moisture, in a temperature above ninety degrees, highly favorable to inorganic decomposition. Why is it that fermentation does not take place? The answer is, vital chemical affinities take hold and triumph over decomposing forces, and determine the phosphate of lime and the compounds that support combustion to their respective quarters. Such is the power that "triumphs over the causes that induce death." There is a limit to this power, and it varies in the same person. If the barometer is high, we inhale more oxygen, our digestion is better; hence, the necessity of forming habits of adaptation, not only to the state of our health, but also of the atmosphere. We are somewhat like steam-engines; one is fifty horse power, others only ten. If we exact from the ten what the fifty can barely do, the ten will break down. So with us, if we take more food than our vital forces can control, then we will have an acid stomach, and if saleratus or soda is taken as a corrective two difficulties immediately appear; the alkaline matter weakens the stomach, and chemically prevents the blood from absorbing the grand digester, oxygen. The true way is, never eat so as to create acidity; never take, nor put saleratus or soda in any food; even salt should be sparingly used; food should never taste salty. There is another difficulty about eating too much; the digestive force with some is greater than the assimilating power; there is a greater flow of nutriment to the circulation than can be taken care of. This is a bad state of things. Add to this the foul air of close rooms, and we have the true seed-bed of colds, scrofula and consumption. Never take cold. If you do, give up over eating, lessen the quantity greatly; throw aside all cakes, pies, butter and fats; rub and wash your body vigorously, and so increase the power of assimilation. Open the windows, let in the oxygen, and keep letting it in forever.

I see a light in the distance. I read, "There is no need of being sick." We live in the inside of a self-renewing and self-repairing house, and all the furniture is self-repairing, even to the shingles which cover it.

In young persons the bones, etc., are not only renewed, but increase in size. The old bones are carried off by the excretory organs. All this refuse matter should be saved and applied to the land, and we may have the happiness to eat ourselves over again once or twice. An apple tree was planted near the grave of Roger Williams; one of its roots invaded the resting-place of the illustrious dead, and the question was raised, "Who ate Roger Williams?" The tree did, and others ate the apples.

In this matter of renewal have we any duty to do? By our food and drink can we facilitate or hinder the process? We can; tea and coffee hinders the renewal; so, also, does superfine flour, and this is a great waste of precious wheat—about one-seventh—enough thrown away every week as would supply us with bread for one day. Human progress is slow; let charity abound; bless good examples; be and do the truth.

MUSIC, NO. 8.

—o—

J. G. RUSSELL.

TIME. In treating upon this peculiar division of the science of music, the writer is forcibly reminded of the impression made upon his mind, while taking his first lesson from one of the good old music books of Dr. Lowell Mason (Boston Academy's Collection of Church Music), which instruction ran as follows:—"During the performance of a piece of music, time passes away," etc. So, also, it does, while working or sleeping, was as deep as the musical conceptions seem to run at the time, and hardly as much attention given to the subject as the hungry farmer boy would give, while counting the minutes of the last hour, preceding his summons to dinner. But upon more mature reflection and reasoning, the subject was revealed in clearer light, and the estimation of its importance has in no wise subsided from that time to the present. Now, in the minds of many, who are in search of musical truths, the question often arises, "What is the utility of such practical recognition of time in singing?"—to which the answer, in its broadest and general sense, would be to produce harmony of action, without which but little would be accomplished in the way of praise-rendering, through the medium of song. As the praises of the sanctuary are generally through this channel, and that, too—many times—in congregational choruses, it follows, as a matter of course, that unless harmony of action be properly secured, chaotic discordancy is the inevitable result. To enhance, then, the indispensable means, requisite to success in this department of the science, the subject must be considered in all its bearings, with a thorough practical application of the same. The more popular and musical term for time is rhythm, which—in borrowed language—"is the periodical recurrence of accent, the measured beat, which marks the character and live expression of the movement."

(Moore's Encyclopedia of Music.)

The first prominent feature, discoverable in rhythm, is the variety of length of tone, which variety numbers no less than eight—all of which should be thoroughly understood, and, in general cases, practically regarded in musical performances. Again, it is asserted that tones have no positive length, but are measured, or determined, by a relative system,—a fact which many singers fail to recognize, and, therefore, encounter difficulties not easily removed. For instance, the familiar melody of Hamburg may be written in two different forms, rhythmically (see illustrations No. 1 and No. 2), and yet be the same tune, with no perceptible change in the time,—a thing which could not be done, if the length of tones was positive. It follows, then, that the important point to be gained is to determine accurately the various relative length of tones. The means, thus employed to this end will here be considered by the more popular term, method. As there are various methods for reaching desired results in the science of mathematics, so, likewise, there are various methods for attaining desired results in musical rhythm. But whatever method may be adopted for securing proper rhythm, the fact is conclusively evident that the great superintending agency is the mind; and if this fails, in his responsible office, the singer is left, as it were, "like a ship without a rudder,"—subject, at any time, to be thrown from the proper rhythm, unless guided by a power superior to his own. This is often done by the method, termed "beating time." As far as the superior exercises influence over the inferior, beneficial results may follow this method of time-keeping; but how much proficiency the musical scholar is acquiring by this course of culture, will clearly be manifest, as soon as left to rely upon his own resource. Without exaggeration it might be asserted that—in a majority of cases—one-third of the number of singers, composing an ordinary choir, practically fail of preserving proper rhythm, if left without a leader! But if the mind—under proper development—performs the task assigned it, of what practical utility would be its subordinate servants, the hand, or the foot, even, in making demonstrations of what the mind, alone, is capable of performing? As the remaining portion of this topic is better befitting a future number, suffice it, now, to say that if visible motions, whatever, are made by the singer, expressive of sustaining rhythm, they should be most carefully superintended by the mind.

FIRST TWO LINES OF HAMBURG.

No. 1.

No. 2.

A REMARKABLE FRAGMENT.

The following lines are handed to us by Mr. Frederick E Partington, a student at Brown University. They were given to him at a book-stall in the little, sooty town of Llanelly, Wales, four years since. The writer of them, a strange looking, shy, retiring girl of eighteen or nineteen years, was pointed out to him by the book-seller as "a dreamer," and the village folks called her crazy. The verses were written in 1868, when she could not have been more than sixteen years of age. Considering the place, the time, and the author, we think the lines remarkable. We believe they have never before been published in this country:

They cry: "He comes—

The signs are sure—all lands are armed for war—
The mystic number is fulfilled—He comes!"

We answer: O that he would come! We want
The Christ! We want a God to burn the truth
Afresh upon the forehead of the world!
We want a Man to walk once more among
The wrangling Pharisees, to drive the beasts
And money-mongers from the temple courts;
To bring the Gospel back again, and prove
How all unlike the Churches are to Christ!
We want that Christ again to tell the "saints"
Their sins: that they were sent to bless the poor,
And they have sold themselves unto the rich,
That they were sent to preach the works of peace,
And they have filled the world with war of words;
That they were sent the messengers of love,
And they have driven love out of their creeds
That they were sent to teach men not to lie,
Nor tremble when their duty led to death—
O for the Christ again! He—He would dare
To tell the Churches how they lie and cant.
And talk of serving God—and serve themselves;
And talk of saving souls—to save their "cause;"

And pure and narrow God's divinest truth
Until a man can hardly be a man
And member of a Church.

Already Christ is coming. Hear ye not
The footfalls of the Lord? He tramples down
The cruel bedges men have built about
The gate that leads to heaven. He rends the creeds
And gives their tatters to the merry winds.
He does not come as bigots prophesy
To choose a handful and to damn the rest,
To found a Jewish-Gentile kingdom here
And roll the world into the past again.
He comes the Spirit of a riper Age
When all that is not good or true shall die—
When all that's bad in custom, false in creed,
And all that makes the boor and mars the man,
Shall pass away for ever. Yes, He comes
To give the world a passion for the truth,
To inspire us with a holy human love,
To make us sure that, ere a man can be
A saint, he first must be a man.

THE SHAKER.

Monthly—60 cents per annum.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

UNREASON OF SHAKER OPPONENTS.

THERE was a time when Shakerism endured the sobriquet of disguised impurity cast by persecuting masses. Now, that it is privileged to enjoy the celebrity of unchallenged purity it is sad that a certain respectable Monthly should feel that "the Shakers must be very weak, to be so very good!"

It does not surprise us, when people say that the life standard of our principles is an unnatural one—that Shakerism generally adopted, would depopulate the world—these are held to be truths by many honest investigators, who are worthy of, and have our respect.

That the Creator made no mistakes in the institutes of nature, we are free to admit; nor feel that this admission encourages only the highest uses of these institutes. The Shakers have a strong, their strongest testimony against the lusts of the flesh; yet no reasonable Shaker has ever decried marriage or reproduction as unrighteous, per se. That these are misused for most lustful purposes, we do make declaration; and let none flutter who do not feel hit. Marriage and reproduction are good. And we would, that those having no knowledge of the better uses of the institutes of nature, might comply with the law of right only, and produce only "sound minds in healthy bodies;" that these institutes might not disgrace the God of nature by bringing forth unsound and disgraceful fruit.

So perverted do we know humanity to be, in the engagements of fleshly lusts, that honorable, undefiled marriage is either nowhere to be found, or is a jewel of rarest earthliness. We do not say this, because conscience teaches us "to find (and live) that better way;" but would prefer, aye, rejoice to say, that marriage was without fault in the eyes of God or man—an honor to him who instituted it, and to all engaged in it. Even then we should live just as we do, perhaps more self-exacting in that which the world complains most of us. It is not because marriage is not good that we refrain from its practice; but because Celibacy is better and best; and will not this assertion be accepted as the only cause of our extreme life practice? Nor do we feel, because we live thus strictly celibate, that all, nor even a majority of present humanity should attempt the practice—only those who "can receive the saying—none save those to whom it is given." And had marriage been for ages past what it should have been, there would now be many thousands fold more celibates than there are; for the rule has been the honoring of the devil rather than of God, through the abuse of the institutes of reproduction, and consequently but little fruit is ripe for an exceedingly godly life. 'Tis a question worthy of most serious reflection by the married, or by those intending it: How much of the higher, heavenly life is there in it? And when this is correctly, truthfully answered, will any blame the Shakers for saying that, however good marriage may be, it is an insult to the Angels to call it a christian institution, from whom Christianity derived an origin? Now, the unreason of our opponents appears most plainly, when, condemning us for certain rules of life, they applaud Jesus most, for the same practices! We deny ourselves as Shakers of no more, nor of any thing, which the great head of christianity denied not himself. If we are despicable or condemnable for self-denials, why not pass the same judgment upon him who was and is our living pattern? Why admire and adore Jesus for doing and being just what we, the Shakers, are upbraided by the multitudes for doing and being? If our opponents, who claim so much respect for Jesus, would but mentally reinstate him on our earth to-day, listen to his teachings, accept his literal rule of life as their dutiful pattern, how much more or longer would they respect him than they do the Shakers? Would not millions "turn away," and only "the few" be left to answer: "To whom shall we go, for thou hast the words of eternal life?" The same reasoning will equally apply to our testimony of peace as opposed to wars of nations, contentions in households, and all church and state combinations. Also to community principles as opposed to selfish relations and property. Wherein do we differ from Jesus? Him, or those whom we love best, we will strive to be like. If the love of Shaker opponents for Jesus, is measured by the nearness of their lives to his life, is there any love lost?

If any will live more like Jesus than we do, we will not despise them, but will try to be like them. It is not a question with us, but an establishment, that we will only approach Jesus, by association, love and obedience to those living more in accord with his life than we do. True, we dance in worship; but who complains of this, equally with the denunciation of our life testimony? We could easily abandon any external form like it, if that would induce men and women to forsake their worldly associations. But no sooner would they honestly forsake these, than they would dance from pure joy, and want us to dance with them. Let us all, "who wear the name of Christ, depart from all iniquity"—live just like him, and one of two things will ensue—our unreasonable opposition to Shakerism will cease, or we will "also turn away" and condemn Jesus as well. "Consistency, thou art a jewel!" Are the multitudes of Shaker opponents and professedly Christian people consistent? And echo answers—; and are we then "so very weak, because we are so very good?" ☆

OUR UNITY.

—o—

THE majority of the people called Shakers, had an earlier education without the domains of Shakerism. While bone and marrow were composing, physically, ideas were making, apparently, eternal impressions.

There is nothing strange in the fact, that upon theological niceties we are not agreed. And moreover, let none hope nor imagine that this can be so in this life. All mere theological discussion for argument's sake, is next to wasted breath—whether "PAUL," and else—but know all people, that we are a unit in belief, in a pure, virgin life, with all it can signify; in a brotherhood of common property; in that peace which comes from all denials to selfish lusts, whether of the flesh, or personal superiority; and in a freedom from worldly associations that would in any manner impede a spiritual advancement. Accept, all people, the true theory of our religious liberality, as expressed by our best living, theological exponent—Elder F. W. Evans:—"BELIEVE, just what you please, theologically, but LIVE the life of Christ." Now, let every Shaker permit this kind of a life to regulate his theology; and keep all old, anti-christian theology out of the discussion of those who would be saints, and we are a unit and will have peace. ☆

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS, BIRDS, ETC.

—o—

WE are proud of humanity, at every recollection or mention of the "Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, etc." May heaven bless, and we believe it will, every one who raises a voice or hand to aid the noble cause. Every youth of our land should learn Cowper's beautiful lines upon "Cruelty," beginning:

"I would not enter on my list of friends,
Though graced with polished manners and fine sense,
The man, who needlessly sets foot upon a worm."

We have received from one Dr. Sterling, of Cleveland, O., a kind but severe criticism upon recipe second, for protection from the crow, in "Spirit of Farm" for June. The gist of the complaint is, that having recommended recipe one as efficacious, the second was one of extreme cruelty. The doctor claims that a thorough knowledge of the crow, and other birds, would convict us of the ill necessity of their extermination. We realize the crow as a scavenger, and, plying his vocation, we believe in respecting his rights as such. Just so with flies, mosquitoes, and many creeping things; but out of their sphere, as intruders, "into scenes sacred to neatness and repose"—into fields, gardens, etc., sacred to better purposes—we believe it right to add sufficient extermination to prevent much recurrence. Says Cowper:

"The sum is this: If man's convenience, health,
Or safety interfere, his rights and claims
Are paramount, and must extinguish theirs."

This is the correct view of the matter. A sickly sentimentalism might open the window to remove a mosquito; and should it rain, put him in the next room until clear! Respect for the rights of all things would prevent our entrance upon territory devoted to the economy of beasts, birds, fishes or insects, for the simple purpose of destruction. Again, wishing the extensive growth of such humane Societies as care for the brutes and birds, we cannot acknowledge the point of the Dr. in the case of the crow, as well taken, as "A necessary act incurs no blame;"

and the protection of our crops is a prime, physical necessity. ☆

ERRATA.

—o—

IN July No. of SHAKER, in article "That Dream," occurred mistakes: The "We" who left Liverpool was intended to mean the ship's crew, and not the writer's family, as he had no family at that time. "Mary Ann," referred to in parenthesis, was not then his wife, but became so some months afterward. The responsibility of mistakes is assumed by us; copying for the press, and intending only to make matters clearer, we made matters worse for some, and enacted some pauca post futuro incidents, for which we claim no credit as a prophet. GOSPEL ARMOR.

—o—

DANIEL ORCUTT.

ACCORDING to ancient history, spears and lances were used as weapons of war, and men wore armor to protect their bodies from them. It was often formed of brass plates laid over each other like the scales of a fish, and jointed together, so as to allow a free motion of the body. We are informed that Goliath's armor weighed nearly two hundred pounds! The Gospel armor, provided by Christ, the good Commander, for volunteers in the spiritual warfare, is a sure defense against the wiles of Satan, the great adversary of souls. "Take unto you the whole armor of God," says Paul to the soldier of the cross. "Stand, therefore,"—resist every attack; "having your loins girt about with truth." An iron belt bound the ancient armor to keep it in place; so truth, encircling the soul, keeps it always guarded, ready for action. "And having on the breastplate of righteousness,"—integrity, holiness, purity of life. The breastplate defended the vital parts, and if one of mail was necessary to protect the heart from the weapons of the enemy, no less so is the breastplate of integrity necessary to preserve the soul from the assaults of Satan. It was Job's incorruptible integrity that gave Satan no advantage over him. "Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye will be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." Fiery darts! such as sudden temptations, wicked impressions, the flaming of sinful passions, etc. "And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." No soldier was fully armed and equipped without a sword. It was short, sharp and two-edged. The sword of the Spirit is a death-dealing weapon of the truest, to remove error, destroy sin and foil temptation. If Eve, in the garden, had used her sword, "the word of God," Satan would not have overpowered her. It was this weapon with which Christ foiled him in the wilderness so that he fled. Stand fast by the "sword." Wield it daily. "Praying always with all prayer." No matter how complete is our armor, or how skillful and courageous we may be, without watchfulness and prayer we shall be beaten. God alone giveth the victory; and when the Christian soldier goes forth fully prepared to war the good warfare and to "fight the good fight," he is sure to overcome in every encounter; and "he that overcometh shall inherit all things."

FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE.

—o—

EMILIO CASTELAR.

YESTERDAY the walls of the Lower House of the Spanish Cortes listened to the true honored pleas in favor of religious intolerance, marshaled by Senor Moyano, the Moderado orator. He urged that Spain's greatness was achieved under the strict rule of the Papacy, that the will of the Pontiff ought to be law to her still. To-day a fresher air swept through the thronged House. The lady of fashion, the statesmen of every shade of political feeling, the whole diplomatic bodies, the passing stranger, listened for two hours and a half enthralled by the eloquence, and hanging upon every word, of the great orator, Emilio Castelar. He said, speaking from his own place: "From the day when the elements of human matter rose up from the confusion of the chaos, uprose with them spirit and heart and conscience; that spirit you cannot curb, that conscience you cannot blind by any human law of coercion. Try it, it has been tried; it has ever failed; it ever will fail. And why? Because it is against the will of the great Creator of the Universe. The State has ever—in the pages of the Divine or human history go and seek it—sought to blind down the conscience of men; Pharaoh, who represented the State, sought to force his own form of worship upon Moses and the Jews; Pilate, the State representative, through seeking to do this, wetted his hands in the blood of the Spotless One; Nero, the Cossack of the Don, King Henry VIII. and his harlot Parliament, Charles IV.—all these, powers of the State, committed a like fatal error; and how do their names sound to our ears? No, brother Deputies, you cannot do it. Sirs, I charge no one with desiring to bring back the cursed age of torments, the horrors of the Inquisition, the street and altar smeared with innocent blood, nay, but, Sirs, I charge you with trying to coerce men to be hypocrites and liars from fear—fear lest their children should be illegitimate, fear lest their rights of citizenship be taken from them, fear lest when dead, their bones should rot on some dunghill, or in the Campo. You say, 'the State undertakes to support the Roman Catholic religion and its ministers.' Well, I give that creed its due honor; I own its beauty, and its force, and its antiquity. And you say, 'This is the true religion.' Sirs, are you so gross as to say, 'This is the true,' because it is imposed by human law and force of arms? Nay, Sirs, you will surely say, 'This is true because, and only because it recommends itself to your heart and conscience as the true one,' and if so, why do you want a human law to force you to follow that which your conscience tells you is true? Are you afraid of a rival? Sirs, you do an honor to Protestantism if you think it so true as to be able, in a fair race, to outrun Roman Catholicism. But if it be not true, this religion of the State—if it be not true, brother Deputies, what then? Magna est veritas et prevalebit. If the Roman Catholic creed be true, it will prevail by force of truth; if Protestantism be true, it will prevail, and you cannot crush it. If this liberty of conscience be of God, you cannot, if of man you need not, crush it. Protestantism and Catholicism have both tried to coerce. Look at their failure in the fall of Felipe II., in the history of England under the Tudors and James II. * * * Sirs, I have appealed to history; I have appealed to your conscience; now I make my appeal to your patriotism. Do you believe because you are triumphant in the North over the bodies, that you have won ascendancy over the souls also, of the Basque peasantry? Religious exaggerations have wrought more ill than democratic exaggerations; but in three months, Sirs, our advanced Republic put an end to the riots in Carthagena, Seville, Cadiz; but, Sirs, four years and 300,000 men have been necessary to put down a religious war! The women of Jerusalem went to the sepulchre, as at this season, and found it empty, and said the body of their Master was stolen; but it was no human voice that answered, 'He is not here: He is risen.' Blind women of Jerusalem. Sirs, foolish women. But more foolish, more blind still are those retrograde and reactionary parties: they are seeking for Christ where He is not, they are seeking Him in His sepulchre of stone—in the feudal castle of Middle Age story, in flame and torment, on the floor of the Inquisition, in history—and lo! He has risen. Yes, Sirs, Deputies, He has risen: He is not there. He has risen in Reason; He has risen in Liberty, in Equality, in Fraternity, in the punishment of John Brown, in the martyrdom of Lincoln. Lo! the chains they break, and they find and fulfill truth and eternal justice. Brother Deputies, go to your libraries, to your publishers, and search those books which breathe this spirit of perfect freedom of thought and conscience; persuade, and seek not to coerce; conciliate, and leave off to persecute; break the chains and fetters that man, and not God, has forged and is forging. I have spoken." The whole speech was delivered without hesitation; bursts of suppressed applause followed at the conclusion of each separate division of the subject, and the House was enthralled. Castelar sat down fairly exhausted with his tremendous effort.

MATERIALIZATION AMONG THE INDIANS.

DEAR EDITOR OF THE SHAKER: The most remarkable case of materialization among the Indians that came to my notice during my twelve years of residence among them was during the summer of 1836, of which I noted down the particulars at the time, and of which the following is the history:

KE-CHE BE-ZHE-KEE, or Big Buffalo, as he was called by the Americans, was at that time chief of that band of Ojibway Indians who dwell on the south-west shores of Lake Superior, and were best known by the name of the "Lake Indians." He was wise and sagacious in council, a great orator, and was much revered by the Indians for his supposed intercourse with the Man-i-toes, or Spirits, from whom they believed he derived much of his eloquence and wisdom in governing the affairs of the tribe.

In the summer of 1836, his only son, a young man of rare promise, suddenly sickened and died. The old chief was almost inconsolable for his loss, and, as a token of his affection for his son, had him dressed and laid in the grave in the same military coat, together with the sword and epaulets, which he had received a few months before as a present from the Great Father at Washington. He also had placed beside him his favorite dog, to be his companion on his journey to the land of souls.

One morning, a few months after his death, the old chief came to my wigwam, his step light and elastic like a child, his form erect and his face lighted up as if he had just received some new and joyful intelligence.

"I have seen him," he said, "I have seen him whom we mourned as dead! I have seen him, and he is still alive!"

"Seen him! when?" I asked.

"Yesterday, in the Me-ta-wa (sacred dance). We were all assembled together in the great dancing lodge of the chiefs, to worship before the Great Spirit, and On-wi came there and joined us."

"What! in your dance before the Great Spirit? Did you speak to him?"

"We did, and he spoke to us."

"What did he say?"

"He said it was weakness for us to mourn for him. He had gone to the happy hunting grounds, far better than these, on the cold shores of the lake. He mentioned some of those whom he had seen, particularly Man-i-ho-zho and Ah-ke-wain-ze, who had welcomed him there."

"Did he join with you in the dance?"

"He did. We all danced before the Great Spirit. On-wi danced with us. His step was light as a fawn. His face was bright as the sky overhead. I wish you could have seen him. It made our hearts glad and joyful as the birds in spring. After the dance we all sat down and smoked the pipe of peace together."

"But how do you know it was On-wi whom you saw? May it not have been some one of the tribe who counterfeited him, with his face painted with the sacred emblems which you wear in the dance?"

"Did I not mark his form, his features, his every look? Was he not dressed in the very coat I gave him, a present from the Great Father at Washington? Who else in all the tribe has a coat like that? How, then, could I be deceived?"

"And you—every one of you—saw him?"

"Every one of us. Ask the aged men, and they will tell you. The wisest men of the tribe were there. Could they, too, be deceived? Have they got eyes and do not see straight forward? Have they got ears and do not hear what is spoken to them? Ask them, and they will tell you the truth. Their tongues are not hung in the middle, speaking lies at both ends, like the pale faces. The toes of their feet do not turn outward, so that they walk two ways at once, like them. They keep straight forward in the path. Ask them, and they will tell you the truth."

I did ask them, and heard from them the same report brought to me by the old chief concerning his son. For many days it was the theme of conversation in every wigwam of the camp. The old men spoke of it in an undertone, with their heads bowed as if in reverence; and one day, while walking through the camp, I saw Wah-chus-co, the great seer of the tribe, standing amidst a group of earnest listeners, and, with a great burst of eloquence, telling them how Ke-che Man-i-toe made the two worlds round, like the sun, for so the Spirits had taught him; and taking a piece of birch bark and drawing on it two spheres touching each other, he pictured to them whole bands of joyous spirits passing from one to the other, thus bringing together the inhabitants of the seen and unseen worlds. CHRISTIANITY OF THE FUTURE.

DAVID SWING.

THE last body has been racked, the last heart broken for religious belief. The State demands only peaceable citizens, the guilt of too much belief or too little, it leaves to be determined at the bar of God. To what shape of Christianity have we come? Not fully to any form has our age come, but with slow and sure footsteps it is drawing near a religion of character. The pageantry of the barbaric ages, the curious questions of the schoolmen, the mysteries of the old creeds rivaling the mysteries of Eleusis, the bloody struggles for temporal power, have all been turned aside or hurled into oblivion, that the human heart might see itself in the great mirror of Jesus Christ. At last, the world draws near the truth that Christianity is not an external architecture, or art, or scarlet robe, is not a speculation; is not a military conquest; but it is a washing white of self in the fountain opened in the being of Christ. The words, "Blessed are they who do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates of the city," are words that betray the genius of the coming religion.

If our hearts are not too sanguine, we are standing upon the borders of an age that will hold a religion of principle, not of form, not of curious or complex dogma, but of those deep principles that make the better man. It is daily becoming more and more evident, that what God demanded all through the Old and New Testaments, was an obedience of his law, the purity of human life; evident in all the reflections of reason, that religion must lie in the inner life; and now, it has become evident by the condition of society, that what is demanded is a religion of virtue.

LOVE AND ORDER.

EMELINE BRADWAY.

Love and order are requisite to promote happiness and to sustain a pure life. Love, unlike passion, produces the fruits of peace, and causes individuals to make large sacrifice of selfish enjoyments, to increase the happiness and comfort of others. The higher spirits in admonishing their charge, gave this precaution—"while cultivating love and good will for each other, beware that you do not foster that which is worse than hate." If we live and love so as to affect each other for good, then are we Christians in truth. Passion has often been permitted to usurp the name of love, but has ever failed to represent the true character of this godly element.

True love is known by its heavenly characteristics, of kindness and constancy, while order unlocks the entrance to the superior harmonies of the Angel life. The necessity of order and regularity to both temporal prosperity and spiritual advancement, is an eternal, unchanging truth. We might as well expect to catch showers from the sky, with vessels bottom upward, as to receive the blessings of divine inspiration from the spirit world, in disorderly and inharmonious conditions. There is no salvation outside the first law of heaven; the law which sustains and pervades the universe, preserves the individuality of all its parts, and their proper relation to each other. Let us keep our vessels clean, and right side up, that we may receive of the waters of life, and as we receive, freely give.

Union Village, O.

WHO CAN IT BE?

A recent visitor at Canterbury writes a most glowing description of one of their spiritual meetings, and of the effective simplicity and sincerity of the people there during the hour of worship. Howells' recent account was thoroughly indorsed; and the opinion fully expressed that "mere doctrines, however good, will not hold people together for a century; it requires an afflatus; meetings of the members very frequently, which the Shakers do nearly every evening of the week, etc." But we are in search of a new contributor to THE SHAKER, and it is the one whom the above writer alludes to, beginning with Fredericka Bremer's words, concerning her: "She is of singular beauty, and a more fascinating, inspired glance than hers, I never beheld," continues, "Hers is an inspirational nature; through her are given many of the songs which enter so largely into the worship and daily life of the Shakers. Here is one:

"Ever changing, ever aiming
Toward a higher, better life;
Ever learning, ever earning,
Is the good believer's strife.
Light unfolding, spirit moulding,
Is the law of endless growth;
Feeding thought and word and action
From the wells of boundless truth."

Then the writer gives us an epitome of "the most effective discourse of the day," from her lips; "the burden of her utterance was the genuineness of one's religious character, etc." Now, Who can this be? and why does she not, and will she not, become an immediate contributor to THE SHAKER? Nor her alone, but let all those choice spirits in form, "send holy inspirations down," and "aid the goodly work along."

Does not the life of THE SHAKER form part and parcel of the perpetuity of our institutions? ☆

OLLAPODRIDA?

THERE are few afflictions, not affecting the health, that are more embarrassing to both speaker and hearer, than stammering. Here what a man, who has entirely cured himself, advises: "Go into some room alone, with any book you choose to read. Close the jaws, so that the teeth will shut tightly. Read aloud for two hours! Your jaws will ache, but immediately thereafter you will talk better, and the practice, persisted in, will insure a cure."

We have had sent us a quarto pamphlet from John Wanamaker, Phila., Pa., containing the very best arrangement of scripture questions for Sunday Schools. As an aid for both Teachers and Scholars, it is an invaluable work. We add our thanks to those of many others, which must reach the publisher. ☆

Two new socialist papers were launched in July—"The Eclectic and Peacemaker," and "The Christian Socialist." The former represents a new undertaking in the associative line, upon a large tract of land in Virginia.

THERE never was an hour in the past, that gave more evidence, that we live in a day of transition. From our own observation, we are assured that creedal forms and churchal bondage stand less as barriers to the acceptance and progress of the truth, than at any time of the past. The time has come, the people are more than ready; and the shackles that have so erroneously bound consciences, are silently, but surely, falling on every side. Instead of our feeling, that never was irreligion more prevalent, let us observe that only the practical truths of Christ are accepted as religion, by the noble and thoughtful of to-day. LOMAS.

"SPIRIT VOICES"—music in July No., is receiving an unusual share of encomiums. Ere long, "Shaker Music Books" will be in active demand. A few more left. Post-paid, 50 cents.

BEECHER.—If Christ should come to New York this morning, He would not find any more followers than he did 1800 years ago. If Jesus Christ should come from Heaven and stand in New York to-day and oppose us, as he opposed all the legends and traditions in the synagogue of that olden city—if he opposed us in the same way, he would have a small following.

POWER OF FAITH.

MARTHA J. ANDERSON.

MOUNT LEBANON, N. Y.

Freely.

Thou who hast walked upon the wave, And calmed the storm on Galilee, Come forth again with power to save, And bid the faithless come to thee.

For tempest tossed like those of old, Are hearts depressed with doubt and fear, May such, through faith, enjoy, behold, A blessed Saviour ever near.

2.

The same rebuke, Oh, may we bear,
Which was to thy disciples given,
Oh, ye of little faith beware
Lest ye may slight the gifts of heaven;
Oh, that our souls might feel the glow
Of faith that filled thy soul with light,
And shed its radiance here below,
To beam with lasting glory bright.

3.

How beautiful that holy trust,
Which made thy life a work sublime,
Whose noble deeds undimmed by rust,
Have lived through all the years of time.
The earthly mind still seeks a sign,
As did the ancient Pharisee,
But, give us, Lord, that faith divine,
Which blest thy heavenly ministry.

4.

The faith that works by truth and love,
To search and purify the heart,
Which turns the mind to joys above,
From sin and worldliness apart.
As oft we ask in silent prayer
From out the soul's Gethisemane,
Our spirits, trusting, own thy care,
And look for strength and help from thee.

ELDER F. W. EVANS — DEAR FRIEND:

I feel strongly impressed to write you, though briefly.

For nearly thirteen years I have been head miller for the Church Family of Shakers, peaceable and friendly with the Society; have been, and am a subscriber to THE SHAKER.

To my mind, it grows better and better. It feasts my heart and soul with spiritual truths, new and old.

The present No. (July) contains truths, by your pen, for which I am so thankful as to cause this expression. I sincerely hope it may be the means of turning the tide of humanity from Priestcraft and Sectarianism, to true and genuine Christianity.

Yours for the truth,

WM. G. DENNISON.

AN IMPRESSIVE THOUGHT.

—o—
We think of the earth as the only solid, substantial and abiding thing; all else is changing, when, in fact, it is only an egg-shell with a yolk of liquid fire seething within. What if there were to be a great rift in the crust, and the ocean let in upon the fiery mass? The generation of steam and gases would blow this great terrestrial bomb-shell into millions of fragments in a twinkling, filling the surrounding space with new asteroids, just as we have reason to think we see now the seventy or eighty fragments of an exploded world moving in their orbits around the sun!

DAILY DUTY.

—o—
Each day its duty brings. The undone task Of yesterday cannot be now fulfilled Without some current work's displacement. "Time

And tide will wait for none." Then let us act So that they need not wait, and keep abreast With them by the discharge of each day's claim; For each new dawn, like a prolific tree, Blossoms with blessings and with duties, which So interwoven grow that he who shirks The latter fails the first. Ye cannot pick The dainty and refuse the task. To win The smile of him who did his Father's will In the great work assigned him, while 'twas day, With love self sacrificing, his high course We must with prayerful footsteps imitate; And, knowing not what one day may bring forth, Live so that Death, come when he may, shall find Us not defaulters in arrears with Time — Mourning, like Titus, "I have lost a day!" — But busily engaged on something which Shall cast a blessing on the world; rebound With one to our own breast, and tend to give To man some benefit, to God some praise.

OUR SAVIOUR.

—O—
ELIJAH MYRICK.

THIS oft-repeated phrase, by force of tradition, centers the mind on the man Jesus, as the Saviour. He was, indeed, one of the world's saviours, by living and teaching "the way, the truth and the life." The power of salvation has always been trusted to the perishable arks of human frailty.

Hence the eternal progress of truth and light cannot be taken upon the authority of any individual as a finality; though they may lead in the way, and become saviours, by their precepts and examples of holy living.

It is not sufficient authority that Jesus, or any one, predicated their rule of life upon certain principles; the basis of these principles — the result of so living — the cause and effect as exemplified in their lives, is the only test — the evidence for an acceptable pattern and guide. With all due respect to the individual, the prophet, it is ours to understand the primary moving cause, as our rule of action, our saviour, as really as they. "And why, even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?"

What Christianity has done for one mortal, it can do for another. The interior germ of Christ is as indestructible as God — the foundation — the star of hope that never sets. It needs the heavenly, the divine atmosphere to develop it into life and growth.

And they who have been most baptized; who have ascended nearest the apex of human possibilities, are saviours, inasmuch as by precept and example they draw others up to their attained elevation.

We see in the Christian dispensation an important evolution in human progress, the resurrection from the natural, the rudimental, to the spiritual, the angelic; and in it is God's divine economy to check excess of population, no more to "destroy men's lives, but to save them."

We see in that divinely-inspired Hebrew youth, a man, a right true man, obedient to a higher law; in no sense a celestial, aboriginal exotic, transplanted to earth. But the then highest, mortal type of the divine — a noble man — becomes a "son of God."

Dependence on past saviours has ever been the bane of individual advancement. Salvation and propitiation rested in the hands of mediators long ago departed. Orphans clinging to the garments of their ancestors, hoping to extract life from what once covered the living: accepting embalmed virtue for the bread and waters of life; for pastures, cultivated fields, forever green.

With such a sense of dependence, of infancy, where is the growth into full Christian stature? Where the voice of courage and aggression against the citadel of sin?

Are not those saviours who bear the ark of the covenant of truth in their own hands? Who overcome the world and walk in the way of the truth and the light? Those who go down into the waters, and uplift fallen humanity, and minister to them till they are also lifted up — saved?

Such are saviours, present saviours, whose lives are so many monuments of heroic manliness, and holy living, to mark how high the tides of divine life have risen on earth.

It bids us take courage, and be glad, for what man has done, he may do: "yea, and greater works." For God is not exhausted, nor the fount of inspiration dried up.

By obedience to Christ — the divine, inherent in man, Jesus became a son of God. And to all who look, for his second appearing, I would say, "Already Christ is come."

Christ has appeared in "a cloud" of living witnesses for truth, who have exchanged the world for heaven's diviner truths, and are working for the growth of their souls.

Jesus gave us the proof-sheet of his best endeavors. Let us read it with the eye of reason, and hearken with the ear of understanding; and with him go on to perfection, singing the song of never-ending joy.

Such are the world's saviours.
Harvard, Mass.

DISCIPLINE OF GOODNESS.

—O—
LARZ ERICKSON.

WHAT is it to be good! How does the goodness of the heart reveal itself?

A man or a woman that obtains the goodness of the heart is, in a great measure, a saviour. Soft, mild and kind words are the signs that proceed from a pure heart. A pure heart is like a good spring, always full. And it is noticed far and wide that many come to drink, and gain strength, so long as the heart, as water, keeps clean. But if the spring gives dirty water, people lose their desire for it, and soon none will visit it to be refreshed. The same with a man and woman called out from the world to be saviours. If they become offended, and speak harsh and bitter words, they do great harm to themselves and others. Let us watch and keep our spirits pure; then we will save many souls and be happy in our saving element. Let us labor to know ourselves as we are, and strive daily to live like our Christian pattern. Then we will think more of our brethren and sisters than of ourselves. Let us not be self-righteous; it is not the safe way to find fault with almost everybody but ourselves. They that gain the most purity and goodness of heart, find the most fault with themselves, and very little with others. They are the most able to fulfill the law of Christ: "Esteeming others more than themselves."

IS WOMAN ANY LONGER RESPONSIBLE?

—O—
RUTH WEBSTER.

EVER since Adam and Eve were expelled from the Garden of Eden, woman has had to bear the reproach of leading mankind into sin.

About one hundred years ago God raised up a woman, and endowed her with wisdom to bring forth a testimony by which mankind might be led out of sin.

Many thousands have realized its efficacy. Henceforth, let every one who continues in sin after hearing the gospel testimony, bear the reproach himself, and not cast it on woman. If mankind had been as ready to have been led out as into sin, long, ere this, lewdness would have ceased in the land, and long since, war would have been no more.

SPIRITUALISM.

—O—
F. W. EVANS.

THE Ruling Church, when it believed in Spiritualism, persecuted Spiritualism as witchcraft and necromancy. It ceased to persecute Spiritualism only when it ceased to believe in its verity.

The skepticism, or infidelity of Protestantism shut the door to the Spirit world — declared the canon of scripture closed — that all revelation had ceased. The Holy Scriptures — to be translated, revised and interpreted by the priesthood — remaining as the only guide and rule of faith and practice.

When Protestant infidelity had thus abjured present revelation — denied its very existence, for either miracle or mischief, denied the existence of ghosts, or disembodied spirits, it affirmed that the dead lay buried in the soil of earth till the last trumpet should sound.

Illogically, Protestants did believe in the devil and his imps, as the source of witchcraft. They hung, burned and tortured men, women and children, as real spiritual mediums. Yet did not believe in Christ Prophets and Prophetesses, whom God raised up to rebuke their own sorceries and murders.

Protestantism is Infidelity — Atheism in its childhood. It was skepticism — Rationalism — not Christianity — that in the Church finally stopped the persecution of Spiritualists, in Old, as in New England.

On the last trial for witchcraft, a woman accused of walking on her head, Judge Mansfield decided that she could so walk, if she chose, as no English law was thereby violated.

When the angel of Spiritualism has, by his great power, confounded Church unbelief and infidelity, what will deter that Church, if it possess the civil power, from treating Spiritualism as witchcraft, or necromancy?

With the same faith and the same power as of old, the Church will make blood flow to the horses' bridles.

Spiritualism is furnishing the faith, and the Church works with indomitable energy to marry the state to gain the power.

The People of these United States are like the dwellers upon the sides of Mt. Vesuvius. They await the upheaval of the internal fires and forces that will spread desolation far and wide.

Let the Vesuvians remove from the mountain; and let the United States citizens remove all Bibles from Public Schools — all Priests from public institutions — Legislative Halls, Courts, Army and Navy, and it will be well. Otherwise, it is only a matter of time, when all are crying Peace and Safety, that sudden and overwhelming destruction will come upon this great American Republic.

"THE TELL-TALE COMPASS."

THEODORE GORHAM.

VESSELS in the merchant service plying year after year from one port to another, find it of great advantage to sail in as direct a line as is practically possible; for on the ocean as on land "time is money." Charts are prepared with great care, and furnished to vessels, showing the most direct, that is, the shortest course to take in order to reach a given destination. It is a known fact that some of the lines of ocean steamers plying between New York and Liverpool make the trip month after month and do not vary one mile out of a given path. This would be an impossibility were it not for the mariner's compass. I shall not go into details about the compass, as all understand the principle on which it is constructed, but I will say that few except those who have tried it, know what vigilance and concentration of mind to say nothing of the physical labor it requires on the part of the man at the wheel to keep the needle pointing in a given direction in spite of tides and counter-currents for two and sometimes four consecutive hours. On board of well-regulated packets none but first-class seamen are allowed to steer the vessel, for every time the vessel goes even one point out of the way for a short time, it delays the ship just so much on her journey and she is just so much longer in reaching port. It used to be the custom and is still on many ships, thought necessary for the officers of the deck to occasionally look at the compass to ascertain if the wheelsman was faithfully performing his duty, but lately there has been devised what has been called by sailors the "Tell-tale Compass." This is fastened or hung overhead to the ceiling of the officer's cabin, face downward, the card of this compass is changed diametrically opposite on account of being inverted in order to make it agree with the compass on deck. The officer has only to cast his eye up to this "tell-tale" in order to know how the ship heads, and if the poor sailor who may not have closed his eyes for the last twenty-four hours should neglect his duty for one minute, he might be informed of it in language not selected from scripture or the rules of the fastidious Chesterfield, but in a language which you will understand when I say is peculiar to sea captains.

MORAL: We all have a vessel to steer through the ocean of life, let us endeavor in spite of counter-currents and adverse winds to keep our ship straight in the path of rectitude, that the master when he looks into our hearts — "the tell-tale compass" — may ever find us faithful to our charge.

Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

"TRY AGAIN."

SARAH A. NEAL.

If the first attempt to accomplish a noble purpose proves a failure, "try again." Could every one be made aware that the road to success led through a country of failures, much of the despair that now blights the zeal of very many because their first efforts do not prove successful ones, would be blown away by the breezes of new endeavors. It would not indicate that our individuality was defective, should many failures crown our exertions for superior development; but our inability would become apparent, did we permit ourselves to submit to the morbid influences of non-exertion because some trifling obstacle seemed, for the time being, to impede our early, intended success. Little satisfaction can come home to the inert soul, who moves not a willing body in the cause of right.

What if our attempts prove only failures many times; perseverance will finally lift us to the summit of success, for they who labor truly, labor to win, even though their day of victory be afar, and no good achievements have been secured, without costing some one very much ardent labor. What phase of life could we present in this, our centennial year, if there had not been some unusually persevering minds, and toiling hands to develop the present status of things, of which our country is now so proud to exhibit? And what had been our gospel cause, if some individuals had not possessed the fortitude to defend Christian principles, against the opposition which is always sure to arise when any advancement is made as an innovation in a new direction? Surely we could hardly have boasted of present growth toward the angelic life, had not successive trials paved the way to even our present acquirements. So let "try again" be our first thought, after having failed to succeed in carrying out any good undertaking, even though we repeat our purpose many times. At least, may we all keep trying, until we achieve that one victory over self, which will be more than equal to many failures in any scientific pursuit. And we need not despair, should we fail to realize this attainment until after this life's ultimate; even then we can lay by our mortality in peace, for over death's river our banners of victory would greet us, encouraging a continual and eternal "try again."

THE DOGMATIST'S CREED.

Believe as I believe — no more, no less;
That I am right, and no one else, confess;
Feel as I feel; think only as I think;
Eat what I eat, and drink but what I drink;
Look as I look; do always as I do,
And then, and only then,
I'll fellowship with you.

That I am right, and always right, I know,
Because my own convictions tell me so;
And to be right is simply this: To be Entirely, in all respects, like me.
To deviate a hair's breadth, or begin
To question, and to doubt,
Or hesitate, is sin.

I reverence the Bible, if it be
Translated first, and then explained — by me,
By churchly laws and customs I abide,
If they with my opinions coincide.
All creeds and doctrines I concede divine,
Excepting those, of course,
Which disagree with mine.

Let sink the drowning, if he will not swim
Upon the plank that I throw out to him;
Let starve the hungry, if he will not eat
My kind and quantity of bread and meat;
Let freeze the naked, if he will not be Clothed in such garments
As are cut for me.

'Twere better that the sick should die than live,
Unless they take the medicine I give;
'Twere better sinners perish than refuse
To be conformed to my peculiar views,
'Twere better that the world stand still than move
In any other way
Than that which I approve.

PRAYER.

ELLEN ROSS.

PRAYER is the guide to self-knowledge; inclining us to look after our errors in order to pray against them. It is a motive that prompts us to vigilance, teaching us to guard against those errors, which through self-examination we are enabled to detect. Prayer is an act prompted by the heart, and is to me one of the most sacred of subjects. Along the pathway of life, through our frequent waywardness, we are forced to acknowledge our dependence on holier influences, and thus we are inclined to ask aid of our heavenly Parents to assist us in resisting evil and doing good instead. As the tree, shrub or tender plant without the aid of air, moisture or sunlight bears neither blossom nor fruit, so must it be with an individual who breathes no fresh atmosphere of hope; is watered by no reviving and sustaining influences of prayer, neither warmed into life by the sunlight of confiding love through prayer. When I reflect upon the great ocean of human life, which, though governed by intelligence, has waves more turbulent, rocks and shoals more dangerous, than the vast ocean of waters that covers so much of the globe, I cannot suppress a feeling of gratitude to God that each and all may, through earnest intercession, realize strength and courage, equal to their needs.

Prayer appears to me to be a beautiful law of our being; necessary to the spirit's growth into higher conditions, and away from the mere sensual plane. Christ exhorted his disciples to "pray without ceasing lest they enter into temptation;" and is it any the less needful that his followers now should enter into the same earnest, prayerful spirit? Have we not to resist the temptations to sin as did the disciples of old? Surely in our present day of trial, we need to implore the Parent of love to open the fountains of truth and light to us. That soul which has been sustained by the sweet influences of prayer, is not content with its own spiritual well-being, but cheerfully exerts its noblest energies to bring others to the true light. It has been said, "the prayers of the righteous avail much." Have we not a few righteous souls among us? And if these, not having the ability to preach, would offer up their sincere and earnest prayers to God, for those who have not the light, and know not the way, would not their prayers avail something? Would not a rich blessing attend them? I certainly feel so. The sincere prayer, humbly offered, gives rerief to the tried soul, peace to the turbulent mind, and gladness to an aching, sorrowing heart. I speak too, from my own experience; for often when I have felt my own weakness, and trials rolled roughly along my pathway, I have looked to the Divine source for strength to resist the current of temptation that swept over me. Often-times I have felt to exclaim, "Sweet is the hour of prayer." And I not faith in prayer, and did I not place my confidence in God, I am sure, long ere this my frail bark would have been overwhelmed by the waves of fierce temptation, and have been driven far from the peaceful shores upon which I now stand. "Sweet is the holy hour of prayer."

PARENTAL CALL.

JAMES G. RUSSELL.

Not in thy strength alone, thou feeble one,
Wilt thou the powers of darkness overcome;
But in the strength of Him who reigns on High,
Thou needst not fear to meet the enemy.
For thou wilt surely conquer, and no power
Can thee withstand in that victorious hour.
The Lord Jehovah is thy sure defense,
His word is Truth, His strength Omnipotence.
Go forth to battle with thine armor on,
And never cease the strife till victory's won.
The Lord hath called thee to this glorious strife;
Be true, and thou shalt win Eternal Life.

RESPONSE.

The solemn call which now to me is given,
To cheer me on to my sweet home in heaven,
I will not slight; nor waste my precious time
In worldly follies that would bar the mind
From purity, and things that are of God;
But I will walk the path my Saviour trod,
And in his love abide:—remembering now
To seal by faithfulness, my earnest vow,
To walk with Christ:—to turn not from the way.
However dark and gloomy seems the day,
Nor when temptation, with its charming smile,
Would tarry near, my footsteps to beguile.
But I will think of Jesus, at the hour
When Satan sought, with feligned display of power,
To make the lowly Nazarene a slave
To his vile shrine,—the answer Jesus gave
Was "Get behind me, Satan!" Vict'ry gained!
Our blessed Jesus, spotless, still remained;
Nor did the tempter tarry longer near,
But instantly withdrew: then did appear
The angel ministers of love divine,
And Jesus' countenance again did shine
With greater radiance, even, than before!
And in his Father's name, the ensign bore,
Of peace and good will unto suffering men.
And I will also think of Jesus, when
On Calvary's height, his mission full to seal,
He suffered martyrdom, with none to heal,
Or even soothe his agonizing wounds,
Nor heed with pitying ear his dying groans!
"O Father," then he prayed, with all in view,
"Forgive them, for they know not what they do."
And thus, by cruel hands he suffered, bled;
A crown of plaited thorns upon his head,—
On either side, through mock'ry, scorn and hate,
Two vagrant sufferers sharing, each, his fate
One weeps—repents— and unto Jesus cries,
And is, that hour, with him in Paradise!
O boundless grace! this lesson here we learn,
The vilest sinner may to God return!
These solemn thoughts awaken in my breast,
Emotion's deep, of unfeigned gratefulness,
And earnest feelings to endure the strife,
Whatever be the cost: a carnal life
Is requisite for sacrifice, to find
That better life—eternal and divine.
And this shall be the burden of my day,
To walk as Jesus walked—to watch and pray.

NOTES BY THE WAY—NO. 3.

—O—

H. C. BLANN.

CHOICE OF LANGUAGE:—While we cherish with fondness, the hope that the future will abound in the perfected gifts of our kind Heavenly Father, we cannot wholly throw off the pressing responsibilities of the present, which are really the stepping-stones to that state of millennial blessedness. The beautiful adornings which the Christian graces so abundantly proffer to us, are greatly enhanced by the careful cultivation of every department of the mind. While we admire all that gives to it tone or character, we have at this time chosen to dwell more particularly upon the right use of Language.

As the object of all Christian teaching is to encourage a cultivation of the better qualities of man, it would seem that great care should be exercised in the selection of the words which we speak or write. We should study to so express ourselves, that we may favorably impress those who dwell within the circle of our influence.

It is too often the case that reverential subjects are sadly mutilated by the introduction of coarse and even vulgar expressions. Instead of carefully selecting from the thousands of words those which will induce an elevating conception, and upon which we may look with pleasure, even as upon the heavenly constellations, we are too often treated with the very reverse. Like the florist, who, among his beautiful flowers, cultivates those which are unsightly and even noxious, simply because they are more readily obtained.

Our Father, through one of His prophets, has said, "I will turn to my people a pure language." A language, ah, a language that men and angels may use and not be ashamed. Why should we not do all in our power to have this prophecy fulfilled in our lives? In this we work with the Lord for His honor and our peace.

Defective orthography and false syntax are far preferable to the coarse and undisciplined manner of speaking, which enters so largely into our conversation. Why use the refuse of language any more than the refuse of food? It is contaminating not only to the breath of the speaker, but to the ears and mind of the hearer. Let us study simplicity, not affectation, and write and speak as we would in the presence of the angels of God.

If the subject is upon that which is spiritual, heavenly—the language should correspond. Every sentence should be infused with the spirit of the beatitudes, and every word chosen with that care which the theme demands. If the inspiration of prayer becomes the leading object of the mind, pray also that a reverential spirit may dictate the expressions which are made, lest we betray ourselves in speaking or writing that of which the ungodly will be ashamed. Avoid extremes. How beautifully and peacefully some will lead us along up through wisdom's path of pleasantness to the very gates of the New Jerusalem, and then in one breath dash us among the swine, and to their wallowing in the mire. If perchance we are led to speak or write of the lake which burneth, as some say, with brimstone and fire, no less care should be exercised than in the preceding. There can be no propriety in the careless use of words, even in the denunciation of that which is obnoxious to the spirit of the pure in heart.

PROGRESS: MULTUM IN PARVO.

—O—

J. JESSE FONDA.

LOVE is life. Harmony is heaven—only in a heavenly state of mind, can heaven come to any. Jesus' prayers brought angels to him, not to us. Jesus' merits saved him. Our merits will save us. Each soul is a manger, cradling a saviour—God in us. The blood of one cannot atone for the sin of another. Good results can only flow from being good.

Every thing seems to have been formed spheroidal—having a mundane and spiritual existence—a principle to pass from one sphere to another. The highest spherical attainment culminates in the acme of wisdom—God—and is the throne, whence comes all law of heaven. Keeping the law of the sphere occupied must result in the highest happiness of that sphere. Violation of law is sin, and brings hell to the participant. The Christ follower is a progressive being, passing on from sphere to sphere. He travails, and by practical demonstrations ignites "a refining fire"—ending in regeneration—thorough spirituality.

Each stage of progression, being an advance from the one abandoned, must not only enjoy all the light that preceded it, but must combine with the new light, forming another series, and causing an iridescent atmosphere, that introduces new laws of government, expanded views of true enjoyment; new actions, thought, language—the gross having passed "the refining fire" and appears as "tried gold." There are a vast number of "hermeneutics" who desire us to adopt their peculiar ways of thinking; but it is preferable to let inspiration be its own solvent, and by fulfilling the laws of the highest sphere to which we have attained, exercise our acknowledged right to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Sonyea, N. Y.

UNSELFISH LOVE.

—O—

J. M. PEEBLES.

THE tendency of the spiritually minded is from grossness to refinement—from promiscuity to chastity—from chastity to holiness—from holiness to divinity. The higher the moral ambition, the more complete and victorious the virtue! This Adamic battle-ground cleared, the kingdom of God has come with its newness of life—"Not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit." The Apostle John declared that he had passed from death unto life; because he loved the brethren. This love can never degenerate into license, nor its liberty into anarchy; for it is a principle, disrobed of earthly passion—a holy resurrection.

All men are my brothers; all women my sisters; all children my children; and I am every mortal's child. Deep is our interest in every infant born into earth life. Its destiny is linked with ours, and our love flows to it free, to all humanity free as God's sunlight.

Let, then, our country be the universe; our home the world; our religion to do good; our rest wherever a human heart beats in harmony with ours; and our desire be to enkindle in the breasts of earth's millions the fires of aspiration, aiding them in their progress up the activities of life, even to the very gate of heaven. Let all the love that can be attracted from our inmost being be appropriated by the poor, and the crushed, and the needy, and the fallen—by you, the world, the angels. Then will be actualized the words of Jesus—"All mine are thine, and thine are mine."

During that precious pentecostal hour, when the divine effluvia streamed down in rivers of light from angelic abodes, not only "many believed," but they were so baptized into those unselfish loves of the spiritual world that they resolved to "have all things in common." When these universal love-principles are made practical the soil will be as free to all to cultivate as the air they breathe; gardens will blossom and bear fruitage for the poor, and orphans will find homes in all houses, there drawn by the music of tenderest sympathy; the brows of toiling millions be wreathed with white roses—symbols of perpetual peace.

MUSIC—NO. 9.

—O—
J. G. RUSSELL.

Rhythm resumed.—Allusion being made to various methods of time-keeping, that of counting comes next for consideration. This method is executed by allowing an equal space of time to elapse between every two counts. Then, with a fore-knowledge of the proper length of tones, ability may be acquired for measuring them by the more preferable way of counting the time, as by this method the mind is forced to perform its office, and but little chance given for counterfeit rhythm. Singers, who practice this method, acquire the ability to keep the time for themselves, and, therefore, need but little assistance aside from themselves while in the practical performance of music. As this method seems most reliable in its results, but little would need to be said of others, such as the use of various kinds of instruments, invented for the purpose. To be brief upon the subject, it might be asserted that any method adopted, that would force the mind to execute its work, would be preferable to one that simply addresses itself to the eye, leaving the singer but little more proficient in the art than if he had received no tuition at all. As evidence of this assertion, take, for example, certain points in the simplest elements of musical science. The quarter rest (♩) requires the same amount of time, in its use, as does a quarter note; but being a space of silence is but little regarded, as many singers seem to get the impression that a piece of music must, of necessity, be one continuous prolongation of tone from beginning to end!

Again, the relative length of notes—in many cases—is but little regarded, especially the dotted quarter, and dotted eighth, which, in Even Time, are generally followed by the eighth and sixteenth; but little notice is taken of the fact that the dotted quarter and eighth, when together, should have the same time as would two quarter notes; or that the dotted eighth and sixteenth should have the same time as two eighths, but the former, though written ♩ ♪ is often performed ♩ ♩, while the latter, though written ♪ ♪, is performed ♩ ♩, the time in both cases being mutilated by non-observance of the relative length of notes.

It has ceased to become a mystery in the mind of the writer, why organists and pianists—as a whole—are so much more proficient in rhythm than vocalists seem to be, when the fact is apparent that counting is almost as conspicuous as fingering in their lessons of practice. One more point, in brief, and we leave, for the present, the subject of rhythm. The term measure—according to its general acceptance—is the space between the bars. Primarily, their number of kinds is four, viz.: Double, Triple, Quadruple and Sextuple. The variety of forms these measures often assume are puzzling obstacles for singers to meet. Three of the measures have each three forms, while the fourth has four. (See illustration.) While no satisfactory reason has ever been given for this seemingly useless variety of forms, the writer is much inclined to the opinion of one prominent professor of music (A. N. Johnson), who neither theoretically nor practically—if memory serves correctly)—recognizes more than one form in each kind of measure,—which form he designates by the figure denoting the number of counts in the measure; which in Double is marked 2, in Triple 3, etc., with the exception of Sextuple, which is marked $\frac{6}{8}$. In this measure the singer takes the eighth note (♩) as the standard count note—making six counts in the measure, or, if preferable, making two counts in the measure, by allowing the time of three eighths to one count; whereas, in the other measures the quarter note is invariably the standard count; and by this method the afflicting obstacle is easily removed.

THE SHAKER.

Monthly—60 cents per annum.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

THE TONE OF THE CHURCHES.

THIS age is not termed a religious age; but we are assured that we live in a time, when genuine religion was never more prevalent than now. This evidence is manifested by the liberality so redundant, almost everywhere. Should Moody and Sankey prove failures otherwise, they must ever stand as the correct thermometers of the religious feelings of to-day. Wherever they have gone, the silent prayers of Moody, and the sweet songs of Sankey have taken the people by storm—a storm they have been waiting for a long time—a storm which even royalty has succumbed to, and which means, a storm, against which "the gates of hell" do not yet know how to prevail! Royalty and Peasantry alike have paid their tributes; and we common people, who live between, have clapped our hands and been very joyous over such an event. We have exclaimed:—"THE MILLENNIUM IS COMING;" and when the misanthrope has said: "So is Christmas," we have set the sails of our Patience to wait so long. We have clapped our hands, and said "AMEN!" just like any Methodist, and "GLORY TO GOD," and "SO BE IT," have not been uncommon nor idle expressions. We have clapped our hands, and said "God Bless!"—any and every one who will break down these aristocratic barriers to true religion—fine sense and "our church"—and we stand ready to "leap with joy" at the expected evidences of liberality that shall say: "We do not care what you believe, if you are honest. Are you sincerely seeking the Christ? If your lives bespeak for you the evidence that Christ is with you, away with all man made tenets, barriers and partitions. Let us take hands upon the Christ life; let us live it, at any, every expense of ourselves and our particular church, and AMEN!" is the universal chorus. And now more than ever seems to be the cry: "Let us love Jesus," and "Live like Jesus;" and "Live with Jesus!" recognizing the truth, that if we ever live with Jesus, we must live like Him. Never was Spiritualism so dull, nor Methodism so equippent; Episcopalianism has used up its reserve; and Presbyterianism experienced all, and more than it wanted of the closest communion; while Congregationalism finds there is something besides its idols to worship—to live and to die for! The Baptists are living—for better purposes,—they love their neighbors better; while the various this and that of theology bring up the rear of chorus, that the millennium is so near. If we go to the Celestial Empire, we are pleased with its progress and salutes; and we are assured that Mohammedan will soon kiss the Greek Church with other than lips of blood. The Tenor of the Churches means a religious peace—a cessation, even an indifference, to the most selfish theology. As Jews, as Christians, as Mohammedans, as Protestants, Catholics, and as SHAKERS, we are nearly ready to agree, that he or she who lives the best life, is the best man or woman, and the best representative religionist. ☆

BY WHOSE AUTHORITY?

—O—
Here are some Shaker Radicals. However unpleasant, are they true?

CHRISTIANITY that is popular to-day is very unlike the original. Reveling in the name, the majority of men and women live no better than before the introduction of Christianity. Do they live nearly as well? Christianity intended the conversion of Jews and Gentiles. From what? Jesus called the fisherman. Some were married, some were not. Jesus taught marriage to be good under Judaism; but there was something better to be observed under Christianity. Consequently, the unmarried entered a chaste, Christian virginity—so did the married—and all became as brethren and sisters. Those who had private, personal property, "great possessions," gave to the poor—shared their substance with the church, and became no more wealthy than its poorest members. It was the glory of the Jews to war. Jesus taught the only good of war, and of any retaliation whatever, to have been prior to the "new gospel" he was commissioned to introduce. Before Jesus, the Church and Caesar were one. Jesus urged a distinction. Popular Christianity has revoked these credentials. It makes a sacrament of marriage—destroying even the appearance of virginity. By whose authority?

Men of "great possessions" are invited and needed by it; and the comparative pittance they bestow upon the poor does not change the complexion of the distinction of rich and poor found among the churches. By whose authority are the rich men and women retained in any Christian church? By whose authority must the poor continue to share so unequally? War is a very respectable feature of modern Christianity, so called. During invasion or rebellion popular Christianity has made Pence, and Pence Societies disreputable. Captains, Colonels and Generals of unchristian, savage war, are the ornaments of churches called Christian. Soldiers carry the New Testament in their knapsacks—presented by war-loving Bible Societies—which scriptures particularly applaud and teach of the PRINCE OF PEACE, whose "servants do not, will not fight;" yet these same soldiers are taught by their churches and chaplains, not to "forgive their enemies" until after they have killed them! The American Peace (?) Society, during the late rebellion, found itself obnoxious to the churches; and it "Resolved: That we call this no war, but a merited castigation upon a slaveholding, rebellious community!" "No war," indeed! Again, we call attention: The popular Christianity of to-day is not genuine Christianity. It does not "follow me"—Jesus. It is not a virgin church, but violates, by its sacraments, rather than protects and preserves virginity. It fosters pride and lust, riches and poverty—and these have ever transformed the true church into a devil's harem. By whose authority are there rich and poor members of any church called Christian? We need a Jesus, with a power equal to "a whip made of large cords." The popular churches of to-day compose and present an unequalled Babylon—mixture of church and State—and almost complete expulsion of genuine Christianity.

This is a thinking age. People will no longer be hoodwinked by priestly paraphernalia and craft. They begin to see the errors of man-made creeds—ambushes of unmeaning words—by which selfish, ungodly men have led the people blindly—forsaking the true faith, under pay of the devil and the applause of the people. "Oh, that He would come," and ask the popular churches in "the broad way," by whose authority, the pattern—the Church of Pentecost—has been so completely reversed? Men and women! think of these things, as applying to us individually. The Church of Christ will ever be unpopular with those who love not the life of Jesus well enough to live it—yet, "they that are ashamed of me, and of my words, of them I will be ashamed." Herein is presented the radical testimony of Shakerism against popular, worldly Christianity. Is it needed? Will it be heeded? Will not the people awake to honesty, denying not Christ, but themselves, and ask with us, BY WHOSE AUTHORITY THE ORDER OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH HAS BEEN SO THOROUGHLY REVERSED? ☆

THAT CROW QUESTION.

IN Aug. No. of SHAKER, we defended our course in regard to the Crow—its extermination from gardens and cornfields, etc. Using Cowper's rule, we believe still, that it and our course were tenable and correct. But as there is too little kindness in the world, and we had all better suffer more wrong than do any, we extract from a private letter, the following from Elder F. W. Evans, which he undoubtedly wrote with many dry smiles:

* * * "Think you wrong on the Crow question! A more thorough knowledge of that bird, his habits, food, etc., would make you his friend. The author of the "Vestiges of Creation," places the crow, as the bird of greatest variety and capacity—a typical bird. There is not much that passes for food among the birds and beasts, that the crow will not eat. Is capable of high culture—can talk in case of necessity, like a parrot—can steal like a man! But on principle, the crow is the farmers' friend. Plenty of crows, no mice, no snakes, no vermin, no potato bugs. Crows are better than Paris-green. This is fit only for anti-christians' use. Let the crow live and your own life will be more secure. We shoot no birds to save our seeds and cherries. They eat the insects and worms out of such productions, thus saving them."

INSECTS, CHILDREN AND CATS.

IN France, the Minister of Public Instruction, Mr. Waddington, appreciating the effect of combined and widely-extended action upon the prevalence of insect pests, issued a circular to the schools of the country, wherein is described in forcible terms the serious results which will ensue if the insect tribe is to continue to revel with impunity; and especially calls upon the school-teachers to point out to children what insects are, and what are not noxious; and further, to condemn most strongly the killing of birds, or taking their nests, and asserts that the law will hold parents responsible for the acts of their children in this respect. The editor of Appleton's Journal, in commenting upon this, suggests the query whether our public schools cannot do more than they now do to teach children to think about many matters in which they now too often err, from sheer ignorance. It occurs to us that much benefit would accrue to the public if an elementary course of entomology were introduced into our normal schools, so that our teachers, knowing something themselves, could influence the children under their charge to act as efficient aids to the farmer, in concerted action toward destroying our injurious insects. Children are naturally destructive, and a little effort, rightly exerted, would make such a duty as is implied here a pleasure, and a pleasure which, sufficiently encouraged, would be productive of a wide-spread benefit.

Jane G. Swisshelm, in a late letter from Brussels, writes in strong condemnation of the cats in this country. As we have often heard foreigners observe, she strongly asserts that the absence of cats in Europe is the prominent cause of the exceeding multiplicity of beautiful birds of song and plumage in that country. She says she has heard more bird-songs in Brussels in seven weeks than she would hear in this country in almost as many years! If the cats and children kill so many birds, which would sing so much and kill so many insects, is it not a duty to study the above suggestions? And is it wrong to kill hundreds of cats? ☆

EDITORIAL NOTES.

A LATE number of The Spiritual Scientist presented nearly a page of good material, copied from our Daniel Fraser's "Divine Afflatus," duly credited, entitled "The Future of Spiritualism."

SAYS Peebles: "To be a spiritualist, is to hold conscious intercourse with the world of spirits, and to live a spiritual life—such as was Jesus Christ's." This is excellent. Now, let us take this lantern, and discover how many spiritualists there really are—such as live the life Jesus did.

THAT was a sad commentary on the unequal footing of general society, where a woman, with her three little ones, was driven by an unfeeling New York landlord from her garret, and had taken refuge on the grave of her husband in Greenwood, and where they were found quietly starving to death, amid the millions of dollars worth of useless furniture. Wherever there is a rich man or woman, let each remember that they are so, because some one else is made correspondingly poor. The words of Wordsworth are true to-day, as when he wrote:

"Homeless, near a thousand homes I stood,
And near a thousand tables, plined and wanted food!"

A PACKAGE by express the other day proved to be some home-made linen for our external wear, from that kind and thoughtful mother at Enfield, Conn., Anna Erving. All our gospel friends will forgive us, for immediately ejaculating for their benefit, something like Luke 10:37.

WE are in receipt of two valuable Sunday School periodicals: The Sunday School Times, Phila., Pa., and The National Sunday School Teacher, Chicago, Ill., are conducted on very similar principles. While both show exceeding care, and a desire to interest the little ones in scripture lessons, we are unable to decide which is the better.

THE "Battle Axe"—a new periodical, published in the interests of peace!—by a thorough annihilation of theological errors. There can be none too many of such; and we are very favorably impressed with the platform upon which it has started, and proposes to run. Address, Independent Tract Society, Worcester, Mass.

THE critical, surgical, annihilative commentary of Elder H. L. Eades, of South Union, Ky., in Religio Phil. Journal, Aug. 8, upon an article written by one Billings, a seceder from Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., was well merited; and handsomely imposed. We thought all the time we were reading it, we had rather be a Shaker than to be Billings!

WE have received from the Editors of the American Agriculturist, N. Y., a copy of a small work on "Broom corn and Broom making"—one of the neatest little works imaginable. It is just such a digest as we have desired for a long time. We had already secured some material for such a work. On page 12, it refers to our people and their connection with broom corn as follows: "It is said that the Shakers of Watervliet, N. Y., first made brooms for sale in 1798, though the plant was cultivated for home use some years previous to that time. Shakers and others, soon engaged in the business to what then seemed a large extent."

The brooms that were first made by us in this Society, were the "round broom;" the handles being cut in the "bush" and smoothed with drawing knife and sand paper. The common and popular "flat" broom, was invented and made by Theodore Bates; and the machine for turning the handles was first conceived and made by the late Jesse Wells, both of this place—Shakers, N. Y.

MISPLACED FEAR.

All languages have a literature of terror about death. But living is far more terrible in reality than dying. It is life that fomented pride, that inflamed vanity, that excited the passions, that feeds the appetites, that founds and builds habits, that establishes character, and, binding up the separate straws of action into one sheaf, lands it into the future, saying, "As ye have sowed so shall ye reap;" and again, "As ye reap, so shall ye sow!" Yet life, which is the mischief maker, is not at all feared. Death, that does no harm, and is only the revealer of life's work, is feared.

THE ROCK OF REST.

—O—
MATTHEW XVI. 18.

Tossed on many a wave of doctrine,
Restless, weary, ill at ease
With beliefs that quiet others,
But as vague to me as these;
I have done with idly chasing
Phantom lights that rise and fall;
Drift no more with drifting doctrines—
Grown indifferent to them all!

Shall I long regret the visions
Of a rest so idly wooed?
Shall I long go on deploring
Creeds, that but opinions proved?
Quenched be every weak emotion!
Bring my future weal or woe,
Weal nor woe shall blight or bless me—
Faith, nor creed, shall move me now!

Murmuring thus, there came a whisper
From the Friend who knew me best:
"Seek the rock on which I builded:
On that rock alone is rest."
Suddenly, with light supernal,
Faith, the higher reason, came,
And my feet touched base eternal—
Benedictions on his name!

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

—O—
The theories of the world wrought out by early priest-philosophers were in great part made up of such grotesque notions; and having become variously implicated with ethical opinions as to the nature and consequences of right and wrong behavior, they acquired a kind of sanctity, so that any thinker who in the light of a wider experience ventured to alter or amend the primitive theory was likely to be vituperated as an irreligious man or atheist. This sort of inference has not yet been wholly abandoned, even in civilized communities. Ever to-day books are written about the "conflict between religion and science," and other books are written with intent to reconcile the two presumed antagonists. But when we look beneath the surface of things, we see that in reality there has never been any conflict between religion and science, nor is any reconciliation called for where harmony has always existed. The real historical conflict, which has been thus curiously misnamed, has been the conflict between the more-crude opinions belonging to the science of an earlier age and the less-crude opinions belonging to the science of a later age. In the course of this contest the more-crude opinions have usually been defended in the name of religion, and the less-crude opinions have invariably won the victory; but religion itself, which is not concerned with opinion, but with the aspiration which leads us to strive after a purer and holier life, has seldom or never been attacked. On the contrary, the scientific men who have conducted the battle on behalf of the less-crude opinions, have generally been influenced by this religious aspiration quite as strongly as the apologists of the more-crude opinions, and so far from religious feeling having been weakened by their perennial series of victories, it has apparently been growing deeper and stronger all the time. The religious sense is as yet too feebly developed in most of us; but certainly in no preceding age have men taken up the work of life with more earnestness or with more real faith in the unseen than at the present day, when so much of what was once deemed all-important knowledge has been consigned to the limbo of mythology.—John Fiske, in Atlantic Monthly.

MAKE YOUR HEAVEN HERE.

—O—
REV. J. T. SUNDERLAND.

THERE is no royal road or short cut to Heaven. If you want a Heaven for yourself in the world to come, prepare it for yourself in the life that now is. You have no reason to think you will enter upon the next life in any wise changed in character from what you are when you leave this. "He that is holy, let him be holy still. He that is unholy, let him be unholy still." And the character with which you leave this world will be the slow and natural growth of the years of your whole earthly life, and cannot be the result of any thing else, the teaching of any theology or man to the contrary notwithstanding. The true conception of human existence doubtless is as one in this world and the next—this the rill, that the river; this the dawn, that the day; this the bud, that the flower; this the blade, that the full corn in the ear. Heaven is not something to be won or got or bought, either by ourselves or somebody else for us; but it is something to grow into. In the next world you are simply your own self, only moved on, and moved up. Swedenborg somewhere gives us a representation of persons who had died, and did not, for a considerable time, even know that they were dead. Their old thoughts and feelings and loves and desires of the earthly life remained, and the world which they had entered did not at first seem different from the one they had left, only it was spiritual instead of physical. Hence they went on with their old employments and ran the rounds of their old pleasures. Only by degrees did they perceive their change of states—and that as they themselves became, by natural processes of growth and development, capable of deeper seeing and higher knowledge.

CARLYLE ON TEACHING.

—O—

AN old letter of Mr. Thomas Carlyle's on teaching, written in 1859 to a young man who asked his counsel, has just been published. In it he says: "The grand secret (worth all the others together, and without which all the others are worth nothing and less) for inculcating and teaching virtues and graces is, that a man honestly, and with more and more of silent sincerity, have them himself, lodged there in the silent depths of his being; they will not fail to shine through and be not only visible but undeniable in whatever he is led to say or to do, and every hour of the day he will, consciously and unconsciously, find good means of teaching them. This is the grand indispensable requisite; this present, the rest is very certain to follow; the rest is mere matter of detail, depending on speciality of circumstance, which a man's own common sense, if he is in earnest toward his aim, will better and better instruct him in. The business, I am sorrowfully aware, is often enough undertaken without this indispensable prerequisite—nay, in general, there is a dim notion abroad that a man can teach such things by merely wishing to do it and without having them himself; but the fatal result inevitably is, he teaches, can teach, nothing but hypocrisy and unblended apathy and meanness. It is a kind of salvation to his poor pupils if they, in a dim way, see through him, and refuse to imbibe the slow poison of such teaching. I fancy you to be an ingenuous young man, aiming manfully to do your best in the vocation which has fallen to you; and I hang up far ahead, I hope, this ugly but true warning upon a certain path which all mortals of us ought to avoid and abhor much more than we do at present."

SOCIAL IMPURITY.

—O—

[The following extracts are from a sermon, preached to a congregation, in the aristocratic city of Pittsfield, Mass. There is so much genuine Shaker preaching in them, we are very happy to quote them for the benefit of our readers. Would to heaven that the 42,000 clergymen of the United States were as bold for truth as the Rev. J. F. Clymer, now of Glens Falls, N. Y. Our thanks to R. M. Offard, for putting the same in tract form.—ED.]

There is a willful and woeful ignorance among all classes in regard to the cause, the effect and enormity of this crime. All men ought to know that God has woven laws into every tissue, and nerve, and muscle, and bone of the human body, the violation of which is just as much a sin as to break any law of the decalogue. The laws of God graven on our bodies have not received that attention from divines and public teachers that their importance demands. We have had acres of sermons on the ethics of Christianity, as they apply to the soul; but scarcely a word on the relations of Christianity to the body. In the rignarole of extreme religionists, the body is regarded as a vile, burdensome thing, an earthly pest to the soul; hence the shameful ignorance of physical laws among some Christians, and their feverish anxiety to get to heaven. I pronounce the human body the grandest combination of physical elements in the universe; the incarnation of the divine ideal of material beauty; the temple of the soul; the sanctuary of the Holy Ghost—"Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" Licentiousness is pre-eminently a body sin. It smites this temple of the Holy Ghost with the dry rot. All men, especially young men, ought to know that this physical sin is hell fire in the bones, and will burn up their bodily powers, leaving the soul homeless and Godless forever. Men of God everywhere ought to cry aloud and spare not, that this iniquity may cease in the land.

Criminal fastidiousness and counterfeited delicacy confront me, and forbid the revelation of covered corruption. Ah, these are they who are so busy with the proprieties and elegances of outside life, that no time is had for securing pure inwardness. The descendants of the Pharisees are not all dead. Whitewashed sepulchres are not out of date yet. Remembering that pure delicacy is a spring sunk deep in the solid rock of integrity, whose clear waters send up no mire nor dirt, I will drink from the limpid stream and go on.

Licentiousness shows itself in the solitary vice of youth. The hard facts of life and eminent physicians tell us that this secret sin is well-nigh universal. Medical men, eminent for ability, say there is scarcely a youth of twelve years, of either sex, who has escaped its ravages. Fond parents are self-deceived when they think their children are innocent. A noted physician says, among the thousands of youths who have come under his notice, scarcely one in a hundred is free from it. Most parents think it the wisest wisdom to keep their children in ignorance of the divinely appointed relations of the sexes, hence they never warn them against this vice, or tell them of the dreadful ruin it brings upon body and soul. Fathers and mothers while you maintain this ominous silence, vile books, lewd pictures in art galleries, wicked companions and leprous newspapers, and obscene theatre bills are slowly, but surely, training your children in this vice. Our literature reeks with licentious filth. Many of our young men pass by the study of history, art, science, and the Bible, counting them trash, and sit for hours gormandizing the "New York Weekly," the "Fireside Companion," the "Day's Doling," and the "Police Gazette."

Very few of you suspect the ruin that the social evil is working among our youth. Through it the best energies are wasted. The rich current of vitality is poured out like water, and strong nerves are shattered and unstrung. Then comes the fatal resort to stimulants to hold up the tottering frame. Then the mad bowl becomes a dire necessity of existence. Then, when sickness comes, there is no vitality to resist the inroads of disease. Many a youth has gone on thus, week after week, and month after month, showing daily the signs of decay, and no one asks the cause of his troubles. The listless eye, the pale cheek, the fitful appetite, the spiteful temper, these are all nature's signals of this sin. At last the victim dies. The community all stand aghast at such a strange providence. The minister stands over the coffin and echoes the voice of the community, and calls this a "mysterious providence that removes one so promising from our midst." It is false. He fell a victim to the violation of God's laws written in his body. God did not kill him; he killed himself. A man need not put a knife to his throat, or a pistol to his breast to become a suicide. A man may eat, or drink, or lust himself to death.

Under the lead of lewdness, a young man may fritter his life away infinitesimally, and society will lay the blame on God. Be not deceived. God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Punishment for violated law is one of the surest things in God's universe. No one violates a law of his body, or any part of it, with impunity. Parents, believe me when I tell you that many of your children are dying daily through this vice. If an unwise silence has put a gulf between you and your children, draw near unto them and they will draw near to you. Fold them in your arms, and in the sanctity of your homes, at the holy shrine of a mother's love, and under the pavilion of a father's affection, tell them of the woe that waits on this vice. Young men, I come to you as the angel came to Lot, and cry out, with my heart in my mouth, escape for your lives from this Sodom! Fly! fly to yon mount of purity, or else it will soon be forever too late.

The violations of the law of chastity are not all outside of marriage relations. Marriage is of God. Its chief corner-stone is love; its other foundation stones are joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; its superstructure, a Christly character, wrought out in a pure fatherhood and a chaste motherhood. Put marriage on any other basis than pure love, and you break the seventh commandment. Let your prime object in marriage be any other than the upbuilding of the soul in godly principles under the law of parentage, and you prostitute the purest institution of God among men. Christ recognized the necessity of pure love in wedlock so much that he classes it with his own love for the church, and makes it the ideal of our love for him. Hear Him speak through Paul, "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church;" with sacrifice, with self-abnegation, and self-renunciation—such a love as subdues every lower motive to a divine purpose. Again, "Wives, submit yourselves unto your husbands, as unto the Lord," not as unto a base and gross humanity. Nothing short of the purest love that can throb in human breast will meet the divine idea of Christian marriage; nothing less than pure love will make our homes the type of heaven, as God intended they should be. Enter into marriage with every thing else but love, and no matter how gorgeous your wedding, or how magnificent your dwelling, your home will be a little hell. Whereas, two youthful souls, with true love, will make an Eden out of a hut.

Some teach that so long as the bounds of civil law are not passed in marriage, there is no sin; that the law of chastity cannot be violated inside the marriage relation, hence vast numbers of otherwise good people refuse to know any law of temperance on this question. Do you not know that the Saviour's interpretation of the seventh commandment, found in Matthew, v. 28, applies to married persons this side of civil law, as well as the other side? The pure Christ has given a heart meaning to the seventh commandment, which covers the relations of husband and wife to each other, as well as their relations to others. God has dedicated marriage as a sanctuary of love and purity; and they who make it a convenience for revelling and grossness, transform it into a den of thieves.

Husbands, Christ's love for the church is the standard set up for you. Wives, the love of a true church of Christ is the example for you; then shall your union be a "perpetual fountain of domestic sweets."

1. If you would avoid this great evil, in all its forms, have nothing to do with bad books or leperous newspapers. Parents, know the names of the author and publisher of every book your children read, and especially those books they read at night, with the lamp by the bedside. In the company of a bad book, you may ruin in an hour what has been the work of a life-time. The way to ruin is cheap; for ten or fifteen cents you can buy a book or paper that will damn you forever.

2. I warn you, keep your imagination pure. Be more terrified at the presence of an impure thought than at the presence of a robber in your house at midnight.

3. Keep your conversation clean. Descend not to furtive flings of lustful wit. Resent, with all the lightning in you, the man or woman who retails in your presence the filthiness of stray speech, or ill-chosen words.

4. Have good, pure men and women for your companions, or walk alone all through life, till the pearly gates burst open at your touch, to let you into the holy city beyond the clouds.

5. Avoid all the modern excipients and stimulants of food or drink, that fire the blood and set the passions in a blaze. Live on simple food. Eat as little of animal food as possible, and you will have less of the animal to contend with in yourself. Avoid the midnight air of club rooms, billiard saloons, ball-rooms and restaurants. Thus you will have pure blood—for a man's blood always gives color to his morals.

Lastly, Walk in the spirit—Rom. viii. 1-4. "For to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace,"

A SONG OF PEACE.

—o—

I.

The grass is green on Bunker Hill,
The waters sweet in Brandywine;
The sword sleeps in the scabbard still,
The farmer keeps his flock and vine;
Then, who would mar the scene to-day,
With vaunt of battlefield or fray?

II.

The brave corn lifts in regiments
Ten thousand sabres in the sun;
The ricks replace the battle tents,
The bannered tassels toss and run,
The neighing steed, the bugle's blast,
These be but stories of the past.

III.

The earth has healed her wounded breast,
The cannons plough the field no more;
The heroes rest! Oh, let them rest
In peace along the peaceful shore!
They fought for peace, for peace they fell;
They sleep in peace, and all is well.

IV.

The fields forget the battles fought,
The trenches wave in golden grain;
Shall we neglect the lessons taught,
And tear the wounds agape again?
Sweet mother nature, nurse the land,
And heal her wounds with gentle hand.

V.

Lo! peace on earth; Lo! flock and fold,
Lo! rich abundance, fat increase,
And valleys clad in sheen of gold
Oh, rise and sing a song of peace!
For Theseus roams the land no more,
And Janus rests with rusted deor.

AGGRANDIZEMENT.

—o—

MONEY is now exactly what mountain promontories over public roads were in old times. The harons fought for them fairly: the strongest and cunningest got them; then fortified them, and made every one who passed below pay toll. Well, capital now is exactly what crags were then. Men fight fairly (we will, at least, grant so much, though it is more than we ought) for their money; but, once having got it, the fortified millionaire can make every body who passes below pay toll to his million, and build another tower of his money-castle. And I can tell you, the poor vagrants by the roadside suffer now quite as much from the bag-baron, as ever they did from the crag-baron. Bags and crags have just the same result on rags.

THE SLAUGHTER OF BIRDS FOR THEIR PLUMAGE.

—o—

Mr. Alfred Newton writes a striking protest to the Times against the wholesale slaughter of birds for the sake of ornamental feathers. He quotes the proceedings of a single sale of feathers to show that to supply that sale alone, 9,700 herons (or egrets) must have been destroyed. All these feathers are said to have come from India last autumn. Mr. Newton observes that no country could supply 10,000 herons in a single breeding season, without nearly rooting out the stock.

Moreover, 15,000 humming birds and upward were included in the sale, of which 740 were of a single kind. As far as we know, none of these birds really diminish the stock of food available for man, so that in destroying them for mere show we empty the world absolutely of a certain portion of its beauty and happiness, while the beauty is certainly by no means made up in the ornamentation of feminine toilets which is thus procured. In this age of blue moralities does no one really bestow a thought on the morality of such reckless spoliation of life as this? — London Spectator.

THE GRAPE CURE.

—o—

ACCORDING to the Pall Mall Gazette, among the most agreeable hygienic processes extant must be reckoned the grape cure. There are on the continent numerous establishments devoted to the use of the remedy; two in France, Aigle in Savoy, and Celles-Bains in the Ardèche; three, at least, in Switzerland—Vevy, Vevey, Montreux; and many in Germany, Austria, the Tyrol, and Hungary. The juice of the grape, containing, according to medical authority, 25 per cent of its weight in active agents—glucose, tartaric acid, potash, chalk, soda, oxide of iron, and manganese in combination with sulphuric acid, phosphoric acid, etc.—there is some reason for comparing this "organic mineral water," as it has been called, with the inorganic, the curative powers of which are so universally recognized, and for expecting similar results from it. The cure is very simple. It consists in eating an immense quantity of grapes, the thin-skinned sweet white varieties being best for the purpose. The patient takes but little ordinary food, and is required to eat three or four pounds of the fruit a day just at first, the quantity being gradually increased to eight, ten, and even twelve pounds of grapes. This is, if possible, to be eaten in the open air, in the vineyard whence the supply is derived—an arrangement which, no doubt, greatly conduces to the efficiency of the cure. It is frequently undertaken in their private practice by French physicians, who possess the material for it in the incomparable Chasselas, of which such quantities are now selling in Paris.

SPIRIT OF THE FARM.

—o—

THE practice of trimming leaves from the vines, to expose grapes to the sunlight, we have found by experience to be an error. Instead of grapes ripening quicker, those trimmed were several days later than those left unexposed to the sun. The quality of the fruit from trimmed vines also suffers. ☆

KEEP this until next season: A neighbor of ours had suffered exceedingly from onion maggot. He used plaster last season and reduced his loss two-thirds. This year he rolled his bed until the ground was hard; sowed it, and as soon as the onions would bear it, tread the earth on both sides next to the onions, so as to press them snugly. We visited his onions lately—not the sign of a maggot anywhere. ☆

JEREMIAH LOW, of this place, has been a valuable, amateur gardener. Recent mishaps, with three-score and ten and more years, add to his inability to do. But he has produced some valuable new fruits—early pears, corn, grapes, mulberries, the white wax bean, and a thornless black-cap raspberry, ever-bearing, that we do not believe can be equaled in the world. ☆

A. J. DOWNING advocated the ploughing of orchards, and our experience has invariably proved, that doing so is much the best plan—turning under clover or some green crop—rather than pasturing or idling. ☆

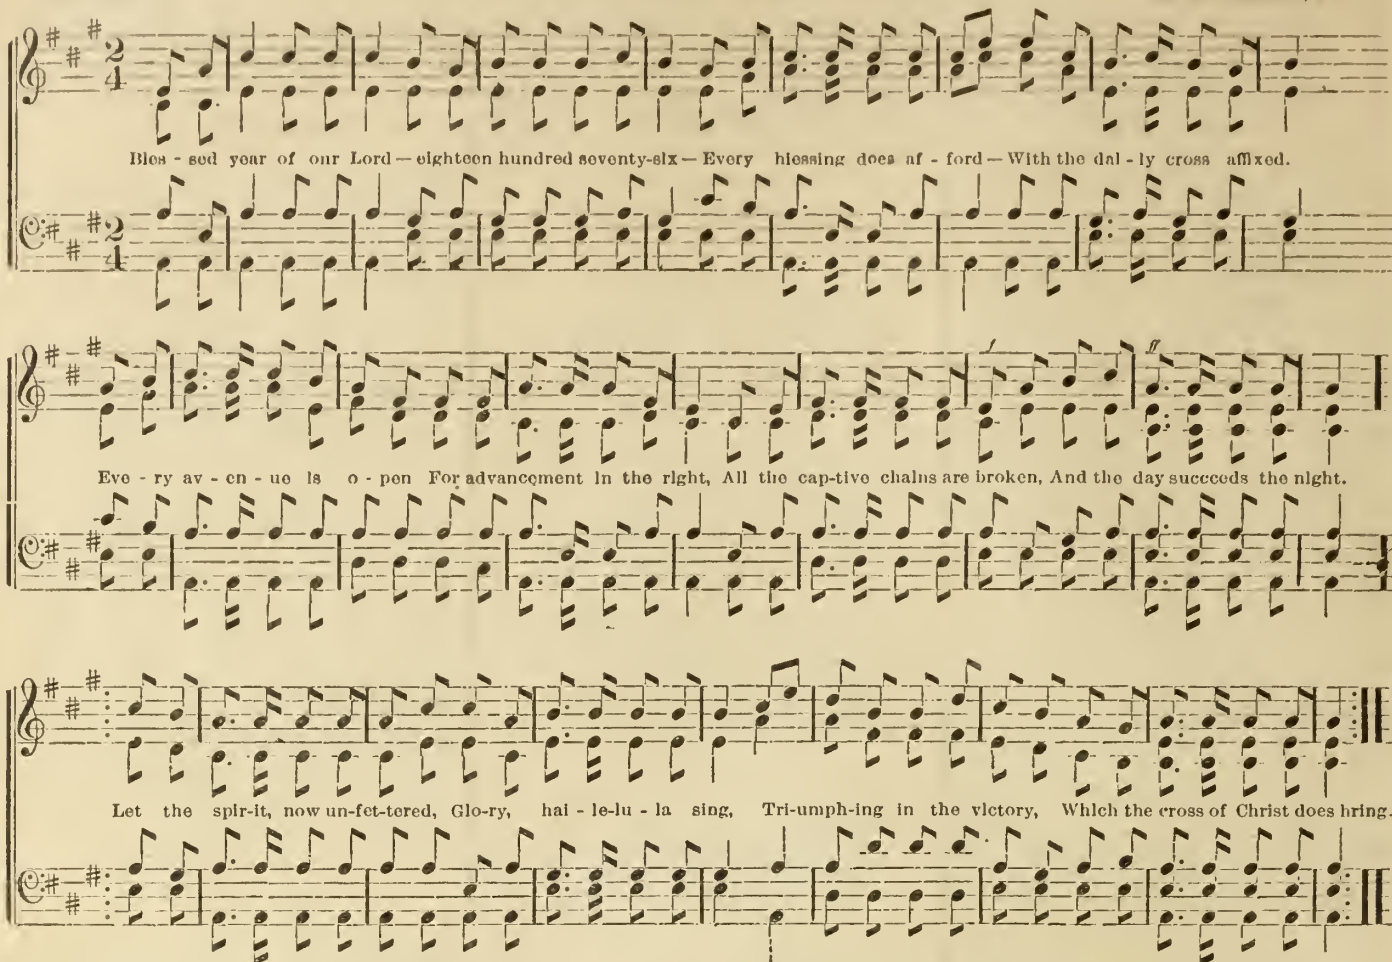

GREAT differences exist between the wheat fields of Shaker farms in Genesee Valley. Recent reports say, some yield only ten bushels to the acre, while others are yielding thirty. Why this difference on alluvial soils? ☆

A spading machine is the latest novelty, and a valuable one too. Tested in Albany county, last week of July, it spaded as fast as three horses could walk with it, a surface three feet wide. The Country Gentleman says: "If it had spaded only two feet wide, two horses could leave the ground in better trim than ploughing, cultivating and harrowing"—three operations. Its work is eight inches in depth. ☆

CENTENNIAL BLESSINGS.

ANN BUSBY.

MOUNT LEBANON, N. Y.

Bles - sed year of our Lord—eighteen hundred seventy-six—Every blessing does af - ford—With the dal - ly cross affixed.

Eve - ry av - en - ue is o - pen For advancement in the right, All the cap-tive chains are broken, And the day succeeds the night.

Let the spir-it, now un-fet-tered, Glo-ry, hal - le-lu - la sing, Tri-umph-ing in the victory, Which the cross of Christ does bring.

Blessed year of our Lord, Let sweet melodies arise,
We will sing with one accord, Of salvation's glorious prize,
Of the rapid line of travel, To our Father's Kingdom new,
We will brave each rising trial, And the heavenly way pursue;
By confession and repentance, We will weave us garments fair,
Rejoicing, that our spirits, We, for glory, may prepare.

May this year of our Lord, New centennial blessings bring,
On the rulers of our land—On the peasant and the king;
May our blest and lovely Zion Be replenished by his band,
And the gospel testimony, Sounded forth o'er sea and land,
May the preaching of the prophets, In the wilderness be heard,
Preparing all the people, For the coming of the Lord.

SOCIETY RECORD.

—o—

THE Ministry of MT. LEBANON and WATERVLIET left the latter place on Aug. 1, for an extended tour of all the WESTERN SOCIETIES. Let us all yearn for them a successful journey. Also, let us remind our western brethren that, though they are strong in spirit and for the CAUSE, they must use some care not to overwork them, and let them return on time.

SHAKERS, N. Y. Crops coming in splendidly. Hay and grain an abundant yield—best quality. Fruits of smaller varieties, excepting Raspberries only medium crop. Apples, Pears, etc., promises most largely, while the gardeners, broom and sweet corn growers are counting a relief by dollars, not far distant. Health apparently superb.

The Colorado bug troubled our early potatoes considerably—in some families bushels were picked from the vines, and their fates were “the end!” ☆

ENFIELD, N. H. An intense drouth still prevails. Nevertheless, crops coming in satisfactorily. An especial good word for potatoes; which, notwithstanding the immense army of beetles, have done well. Busy fingers have, in days and weeks, destroyed mil—hundreds of thousands! Sales of brooms and seeds moderate. The dairy good. From the average of 30 cows, seventy cheeses have been produced, besides 65 or 70 lbs. of butter weekly. Sixteen calves reared. Pail and Tub business resting; but must begin again soon. “Hope so, we want one.” Health of Society good; and we report general prosperity throughout. ☆

ENFIELD, CONN. Bro. Richard Van Dusen has a pear orchard of four acres, which we almost imagine, this season he challenges the world with.

The Church Family have begun a new Dwelling House—form of Greek Cross—96 feet long, and cross-wise. This building is to be heated by steam. New Depot being built by the Society. Albert Battles is proposed as P. M. for a new P. O. Hereafter, friends! direct all letters for Enfield, Conn., to “SHAKER STATION, HARTFORD CO., CONN.” Bro. B. S. Kellogg, we are glad to hear, is improving. Get up, and well. ☆

GROVELAND, N. Y., about this time is experiencing a refreshing season of Mt. Lebanon baptism. Although wheat is only moderate, yet no complaint is heard of the general appearance and harvest of crops. Zeal generally is prevalent at the Centre, and that “happy family” at the west continues “happy.” ☆

HANCOCK, MASS. A passage through this village lately, inspired our heart of hearts with much hope. There is much of God in Hancock,—for order prevailed. Fences, buildings, (many new ones,) were superior to the heretofore, and the kindness of Bro. Ira Lawson unequalled. ☆

CANTERBURY, N. H. The hay crop is secured, every load of the same gathered in best condition. Blue berries thick, fifty bushels will be gathered by our families this season. Health of Society remarkably good in view of the hot weather we have had. Sorry to hear of one case (A. C. S.) that has been very bad, but glad to hear of the convalescence, and the acknowledged causes—unphysiological conditions. Public audiences too large for the house of worship—have had thoughts of taking up contributions for its extension. People in this neighborhood of the best class, but poor as we are (!) and we have but little hopes of the desired amount. The reason of their poverty must be because they are so good. ☆

BEING in the closest accord with our Publisher, we urge an immediate, and comforting response, to the Circular he has so recently issued to the various trusteeships individually; and may each response be a hearty Amen! ☆

THE BRIGHT SIDE.—Dr. Johnson used to say that a habit of looking at the best side of every event is better than a thousand pounds a year. Bishop Hall quaintly remarks, “For every bad there might be a worse, and when a man breaks his leg, let him be thankful that it was not his neck.” When Fenelon's library was on fire, “God be praised,” he exclaimed, “that it was not the dwelling of some poor man.” This is the true spirit of cheerfulness and submission—one of the most beautiful traits that can possess the human heart. Resolve to see this world on the sunny side, and you have almost won the battle of life at the outset.

NO CROSS, NO CROWN.—Coleridge remarked, that the temper of the present age inclines it to every enervating indulgence. Men appear to think the Christian armor an unnecessary incumbrance; they have no desire to engage in any combat, to undergo any trial; if religion is to be cultivated, it must be as one of the fine arts—as an element of belles-lettres; they forget or despise the saying of Bishop Patrick, that there is no passage to celestial glory but by some cross; that we must suffer with Christ, as well as confess Him, if we would be with Him in Paradise.

"AND as they did eat, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said take, eat; this is my body."

Which was his body? Those whom he was addressing? Who had continued with him in his temptations? To whom he appointed a kingdom as his father had appointed unto him? Who were to be the body through which Christ would continue to be manifest? Or was it the bread which he passed round as a symbol of union?

And while he was committing to them this great trust—this life—this new testament for many, for the remission of sins, did he not pass the cup as a seal of unity—a confirmation that they were one living body?

If this version is good grammar, and makes Jesus appear more sensible, then cast away the old bottles of tradition, and seek new bottles for the fruit of the vine, which we shall partake of, new, in our Father's (and mother's) kingdom.

Heed no longer dying echoes—
Echoes from the voices gone!
While the trumpet voice of progress,
Tells us of a brighter dawn.

WHERE GOD IS.

—O—
MT. LEBANON, Sept. 29, 1876.

BELoved EDITOR:

September number is good; "Our Saviour," and "By Whose Authority," I like; "Social Impurity"—plain, but true—will do good.

My letter to Elder Abraham should be published—it is time.

The highest form of virtue, now, is among the skeptics to all false theologies.

A hundred years ago, the most spiritual good was with the Orthodox and the Dissenting Sectarians, and the Witnesses.

To-day, God is more perfectly revealed in some who deny, or doubt the existence of a Supreme being, than in the Christian Priesthood.

Works, not faith; facts, not faction; acts, not words; lives, not creeds, are the most pregnant with the good. God is good; God is truth. The hearts of men and women, not their whims and notions—their intellectual conceptions, or cloudy plans and systems—are what God looks at; be sure of that.

God is in the liberal, the scientific, the land reformer, the woman's rights advocate, the physiologist, the moral regenerators, the coöperator and communist—seekers after righteousness upon humanitarian grounds—who so love their fellow-men that their whole lives, fortunes and sacred honor are pledged as guaranties of their unselfishness. These love God, and they worship Him and Her, in spirit, through the truth they teach and practice. And God cares no more for their lip negations, than he cares for the lip affirmations of those who say they are religious, yet who are monopolizing the earth, so that the mock cannot inherit it—by a financial system of bank robbery and its concomitants—in usurping man-power in all church and state organizations, are acting out devilism.

This is a day of substance. Theological shadows are passing away like fogs upon the mountains when the sun rises, it shining in strength and glory. The new earth is gradually coming up out of the general chaos, like a new continent rising out of the sea.

The new heavens are coming down from God, by Divine revelation. As the light of the natural sun bursts through the clouds of the earth, so shall the coming of the sons and daughters of man be. Having commenced, they will keep coming, the path of the right doer being like the sun that shines brighter and brighter until the meridian is attained.

Yours,

F. W. EVANS.

HOW CAN WE SERVE GOD MOST ACCEPTABLY?

—O—
RUTH WEBSTER.

THIS is a very important question—one that has led to a great variety of practices, each having for its professed object the approbation of God. If we wished to meet the approbation of any one, or to do him service, it would be necessary, in the first place, to know what his character is, in order to know what would be pleasing to him; for that which would be pleasing to a Nero, would be abhorrent to a Howard. Mankind have, in all ages of the world, had different ideas of the character of God, and consequently have differed in their service and manner of worship. He has been represented as a God of vengeance, a judge severe, the great Jehovah; but to me there is no appellation so dear as "Our Father who art in heaven." I love to contemplate Him as standing in this relation to all the children of men. So all are brethren and sisters in their natural creation, but those who receive the testimony of Christ have power given them to become the sons and daughters of God in an especial manner; and as he is no respecter of persons, should we not strive to be like him? As Christ came to do the will of God, we may learn by his doings and teachings what will be pleasing to Him. The prophet Isaiah gives us that which is to the point. "Is it such a fast that I have chosen, a day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head like a bulrush and spread sackcloth and ashes under him? Wilt thou call this a fast and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens and let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house; when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?" That here is acceptable service, no one needs be mistaken.

Then again, Prov., 13th chapter: "He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker, but he that honoreth him hath mercy on the poor." Again, there is a very impressive lesson taught in the parable of the sheep and goats, Matt., 25th chapter, commencing at the 40th verse. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, he shall set the sheep on the right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say to those on the right hand: 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.' Then shall the righteous answer him: 'When saw we thee thus, and ministered to thee?' Then shall the King say unto them: 'Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it to the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' Then shall he also say to them on his left hand: 'Depart from me, ye cursed, for I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not.' Then shall they also answer him, saying: 'Lord, when saw we thee ahungred, or athirst, or a stranger, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister to thee?' Then shall he answer them, saying: 'Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.'"

This was the ground of their condemnation—lack of charity. We talk of religious service as if it consisted in singing, preaching and praying. These may be useful as helps to inspire each other to renewed zeal in carrying out in practice the religious principle which the apostle James says is to visit the widow and fatherless, and to keep unspotted from the world. Religion implies action—doing good to the needy, as in the case of Cornelius: "Thy prayers and thy alms are come up for a memorial before God. Again thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are had in remembrance in the sight of God." God seems to have an especial regard for the poor, and claims them as his heritage, as saith the apostle: "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him?"

Christ gave it as one of the tests by which it might be known that he was the Son of God, that "the poor have the gospel preached to them." His mission on earth was, to raise the fallen and bless the poor. This is God-like labor, and unless his followers engage in it, their profession is vain. As saith the apostle: "If any man hath this world's goods and seeth his brother have need, and shuts up his bowels of compassion against him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Christ gave one injunction that is seldom complied with. It is this: "When thou makest a feast, do not call thy rich neighbors and friends, lest they bid you again, and so a recompense be made; but when ye make a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the halt and blind. These cannot reward you, but ye shall be rewarded at the resurrection of the just." God has made many promises to those who give to the poor, such as "He that giveth to the poor shall not lack." Again, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again." Agur's prayer was: "Give me neither poverty nor riches, lest I be full and deny thee, or be poor and steal, and take the name of God in vain." This condition may be realized by entering Christ's kingdom on earth, where there is neither rich nor poor, but perfect equality. "As the liberal deviseth liberal things," are there not some liberal souls who are ready to give of their substance for the good of others? We think that the greatest amount of good can be done by gathering the poor into communities, where they may be self-sustaining, and in their turn help others.

As there is no benevolence without sacrifice, so there is no sacrifice without a corresponding reward. I think that the question at the head of this article may be truly answered, that he renders the most acceptable service to God who serves humanity best.

"JESUS WEPT."

—O—

SARAH ANN NEAL.

IN reading the Book of books, we learn that our beautiful, Christian leader was "a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief," to such an extent, that it is stated "he often wept." Now, when Jesus came to perform his God-ordained mission it was a time when spiritual darkness reigned, and human nature had grown almost inexorable in its perverseness. His mission was the ushering in of a new kingdom of God, which was to be established upon the earth; he therefore necessarily became the exponent of new truths, which were directly diametrical to those of the earthly order. Jesus, knowing that this new departure from written creeds was a move that would create for himself many enemies, and cause him much sorrow, still felt the force of his mission, and, realizing the power that guided him, faltered not to perform it; and, ere the good spirit had suffered his toil-worn body to be crucified on Calvary's cross, he had established, under divine guidance, a plan of salvation whereby humanity could regain its lost perfection. This done, his beautiful soul went home to God, to dwell in the joys of the heavenly kingdom. But it was not the work of a moment, to lay the foundation of a new order of life, wherein only fruits of righteousness should grow; for our precious Saviour passed years in toiling and weeping for the growth of those principles, which he knew to be emanations from a divine source. Truly those were days of darkness in which Jesus sowed the seeds of godly truth and watered them with tears, that they might grow to the glory of God. But he lived in earth-life only sufficiently long to see but few who felt the power of his call—to come up and live the higher life—when, having performed his mission, his peaceful spirit left the material form, then spiked to the cross. Still, a few had accepted the teachings of Jesus, and gathered to him as true disciples, keeping the principles intact so long as they lived. And, indeed, they have remained intact since their first communication to mankind; and we, who claim a discipleship to Christianity, have them now, to toil for, and, if need be, to weep for, that they may grow in our souls and develop our characters, even to the Christ standard; then shall we be able to impart a saving influence that will help others to improve their conditions. But "Jesus wept," and shall we not sip from that cup of sorrow, from which he drank so freely, and with him weep also? Yea, very many times, rather than stand with idle indifference, and see the truth go down! Surely we will strive for the truth, that we may share with him that peace which is beyond the strife. Although we have seen Jesus to be a man of sorrow, we know he was not wholly a stranger to joy; for he found a joy even in the midst of sorrow, by doing his Father's will; and precious to his soul, and fraught with joy, were those seasons he enjoyed in communion with his divine parentage, which never forsook him while he remained an earth-toiler. Those were seasons in which he became endowed with a strength which lifted him above all human error, for it is written, "he partook of the nature of man, and was tempted in all points, but without sin." Thus we have before us an example of perfection—a beacon light that points the soul upward for salvation. And may we find strength, even as did Jesus, to meet the sorrows which the cross brings, with a smile of patience, and bear them with such Christian fortitude that will work for our souls an eternal good. Let us commune with the good spirit, as he did; for, precious to every true Christian are those seasons, when the soul, alone with God, can weep and toil for its deliverance from the temptations and sins of darkness. And, finally, let us build up the principles of Jesus, by overcoming every evil propensity in our natures, that we may say, with Christ, "we have overcome the world."

It is the earnest workers only, who properly develop themselves into Christian men and women in this life. Those who neglect to do the proper work of this life's improvement, will unhappily defer it to the next sphere. The scholar who has a necessary lesson to learn, and fails of learning it, has the discomfort to think that it, and other lessons, must be learned sooner or later in the future.

JAMES LANGRIDGE.

A GOOD IDEA.

F. W. EVANS.

"Kill the cats!" That was a good suggestion in September number. They are the greatest nuisances on the premises; have to be killed now, to keep them within bounds. Kill a few more and it will lessen the number of cat deaths in the future.

Mother Ann Lee affirmed that cats were mediums of evil spirits. She enjoined her children not to play with, nor fondle cats. A good rule. They are the causes of weakly children in many households.

We have no dogs, why should we have cats?

The dog loves his master or mistress. The cat loves the house, and will return, if taken away by the removing owner.

How shall we keep the mice and rats in check?

Let some of the readers of THE SHAKER answer.

Do right, kill the cats, and "the birds of the air" will tell subscribers how to abate the lesser nuisances of rats and mice.

MUSIC—NO. 10.

—O—

J. G. RUSSELL.

EXPRESSION.—Last, but not least in the art of vocal rendering, comes the subject universally known by the term expression. In fact, it is so far from being least, that it is the greatest and most important point for recognition. Taken thus up for commentation at so late a period in this series of articles is to be accounted for from the fact that it is not only the most difficult point for singers to attain, but that it also becomes the grand completion of musical effect. It not only embraces the various rules and principles of musical notation, but it comprehends also the deepest and most genuine feelings of the singer. It is, in short, the soul of music. With much veracity it might be asserted that in a majority of cases singers fail to reach this most desirable point, and in consequence of this failure, the severest condemnation is often pronounced, not only upon the unsuccessful performer, but even upon the science itself, alleging that its mechanical process, renders musical effect void of life and soul-stirring ministration. This critical view of the case may not be altogether groundless, but the question for consideration is, whether this musical failure arises from an attempt to reach the desired point through scientific appliances, or from some other causes not so apparent in the eye of the critic. In joining issue upon this debatable point, the writer would emphatically declare his belief—which has nearly become knowledge—that the fault lies not with the science, neither with the singer, if sufficient time has not been stipulated for reaching that degree of proficiency requisite for insuring successful results. But the assertion is often made that singers, after commencing their scientific course of music culture, do not manifest so much energy and spirit in singing as they did before entering upon their scientific course. Without denial of this assertion, we will reason from facts just as they exist.

Individual, or solo singing, may be beautiful in effect, even when the performer knows little or nothing about music, scientifically, for the reason that one mind controls the performance; and whatever may be the violations of scientific laws, they are unsubjected to the clashing which would be sure to result from a plurality of voices, as in the latter case the performance is superintended by as many minds as there are singers, all of whom must be more or less at variance with each other, either in pitch, rhythm, or power of tone. Viewed in the light of solo effect, non-scientists may claim the supremacy in certain cases, but not in all, as will soon appear. One great and grand law, superseding all others, of the science of music, is, that every tone in a musical performance must be given by a perfect union of voices. Now, with scientists, in regard to pitch, rhythm, and power of tone, the mind of one is the mind of all; therefore clashing may be just as foreign in chorus effect as it can be in solo effect. Again, when expression demands—as is sometimes the case—a departure from the established laws of music, the scientists, knowing the groundless position they occupy, yield their judgments at once to the unlimited control of a leader, and thereby preserve the same harmony of action they maintained before the interruption took place—a feature not discoverable with non-scientists. But there is another point for consideration, which has as much to do with musical effect, and even more with individual cases, than all that has yet been up for discussion, and that is the management of the voice. Many voices are badly managed, and this fault is alarmingly prevalent among non-scientists, though, to do them justice, it should be added that a few of this class were endowed by nature with remarkable voices, that, in a personal point of view, no scientific culture could much improve; but in a great majority of cases, this class of voices manifest, prematurely, a lamentable failure, often a total wreck, arising many times simply through ignorance in management. But we must here leave the subject where it now stands, promising, however, to clear it up to completion at some future time, simply observing, as a temporary close, that however great or remarkable the endowments of nature may have been, or however much in the spirit we may sing, we can render the praises of God to perfection only as we sing "with the spirit, and with the understanding also."

CORRESPONDENCE.

—O—

ENFIELD, N. H. Aug. 9th, 1876.

G. A. LOMAS, Editor, SHAKERS, N. Y.

DEAR FRIEND:—Allow me to give expression to the promptings of my inner life, in praise and commendation of the precious truths and principles so ably and manfully advocated in THE SHAKER, and which are so much needed at the present time, and which were also uttered forth to the world by our Lord and master Jesus Christ, when here on earth personally, who said "I am the way, the truth and the life." It is high time I sincerely believe, for humanity to pause, think, consider watchfully and prayerfully the signs of the times at what a poor rate the majority of souls are now living, so far away from the teachings of Jesus, his life. True spiritualism and true Shakerism, I believe, must step to the front of priestcraft, sectarianism and old theology, take the lead in the broad, universal religion of Jesus of Nazareth, free for all, without money and without price. May God, His angels, ministering spirits, speedily help us all to be wise for ourselves and choose that better part and live it, which can never be taken away from us.

Then as said Jesus we can truthfully exclaim "The kingdom of God is within us."

Respectfully,
WM. C. DENNISON.

163 JACKSON ST., BROOKLYN.

MY DEAR CECILIA:—My departure was so hurried that I was unable to say many things to you that were on my mind during my stay among your people. I wished to thank you for your kindness and interest in a personal stranger, and to express my unqualified admiration of your high aims and pure life, and of the complete success which has attended your efforts toward the founding of a social system ruled by brotherly love. You have attained the ideal life for which poets and philosophers have longed in all ages. Your mutual love and confidence are perfect and undisturbed, and you earn your living and enjoy it in the fullest sense of the word. All this is what constitutes a happy, earthly life—a truly happy and enviable one.

For futurity, if there be such a prospect before us, I suppose those who are good now will be blessed hereafter. Could I but agree with you upon this all important point, how quickly would I fly from the vanities and disappointments of the world to your sweet haven of peace, your heaven upon earth. It might be wrong in me to yield to such selfish impulse, and leave a devoted mother at a time when she most needs my companionship; and to prevent this, destiny has placed an insurmountable barrier between me and temptation.

Well, I believe after all I can find great usefulness in the world, and perhaps some form and degree of happiness as well.

In the meantime I shall be a regular Shaker missionary, raising my voice wherever I go, in defense of your principles, as practiced by yourselves, and in description of your happiness therein.

If I can aid, by a mite's worth an order of people having such virtuous and healthy minds, I shall certainly feel it my duty to do so.

Yours truly,

ELLEN E. KENYON.

TO CECILIA DEYVR.

July 23, 1876.

AYER, MASS., Sept. 3d, 1876.

DEAR BROTHER NICHOLAS:

Your "Circular" is received. Thanks for it and also for all the burdens you bear to keep alive our little bark; with its white sail of peace it is yet destined to go higher up the stream of human possibilities than any of the many-colored sails that float on the great sea of time's waters.

What if there is a little "friction," is it not much better than a dead calm—sleeping upon our oars—a dead level of thought and feeling?

You, dear brother, draw largely on our gratitude and sympathy for the interest you take in our general enterprise.

It is an age of thought and investigation which we can no more escape than we can the atmosphere around us. It is in the atmosphere.

If we ever become proficient scholars in the school of Christ, it will be when we learn to love one another, even if our opinions do not all take form alike, and at the same time.

If our lives are pure and unselfish, honest, and separated from the world, the virtues of charity and forbearance will follow as the flow of water or the ascent of flame.

The new bottle for the new wine was not peculiar, and only adapted to the time of Jesus.

Every new revolution will need its new garment and new bottles.

I believe the increase will come, if we first become so weak we cannot resist it.

If all labor for the growth of their own souls, it will add to the increase of the Christ kingdom.

THE SHAKER,

Long may it wave

O'er the world be free,

With its power to save.

Our public meetings are well attended. We tell the people how we live (or are trying to live), and advise them to come up to the natural and moral law, preparatory to Christianity.

Please accept of my best love and the love of all in our humble home, and give of the same to all dear friends in your beautiful abode.

Yours, in love,

N. A. BRIGGS, Pub.

ELIJAH MYRICK.

ENFIELD, September 12, 1876.

DEAR EDITOR: A short paragraph having appeared in the American Socialist, quoted from THE SHAKER, runs thus: "Tell a man his faults, and he will hate you forever." Without special reference to the remedy proposed in the A. S., I would say that the application cannot be applied to any true Shaker. In all my experience in Shakerism I have never observed any one that was honestly, purposely, and understandingly traveling away from a lower nature, that would take offense, or carry hatred in his heart forever, as above stated. Many times we find it beneficial to be told our faults, even when not done from the best motives. I do admit there is a class that would answer to all that would come under the meaning of the term hate, at having their faults exposed to them; but it is also well known, such a class cannot by any means be ranked among genuine Shakers. And it would be very questionable if the Divine Order of the gospel could not reach such—whether any other means could ever alter their hearts' obliquities.

Yours in brotherly love,

ROBERT AITKIN.

RIO VISTA, CAL., September 2, 1876.

BRO. D. FRASER: Allow me to thank you most sincerely for your articles in THE SHAKER, especially those entitled, "Chemical Forces of Plants and Animals." To use a miner's phrase, "they go to the bed-rock;" and are such a clear exposition of dietary truth, that I cannot refrain from expressing my admiration of them.

If you had the millions of an Astor or a Stewart to bestow upon the people, they would not do so much good as your articles are calculated to effect.

Truly yours,

E. Y.

MT. LEBANON, Aug. 13, 1876.

RICHARD FLETCHER:

Dear Brother—Your letter of July 3d is received. In it you ask, "Would dear Elder F. W. Evans abolish the Sabbath entirely? That leading article will astonish some folks * * * The French did away with a Sabbath of rest one time. Shall we follow them?"

Many thanks for your kind epistle, and may the feeling of love and friendship you therein expressed cover my apparent negligence to answer it.

Gladly do I unite with you in admiring the beautiful characters which a long life, subject to gospel discipline and its saving power, has produced in the many aged Believers, whose company we still enjoy, and whose example we may profit by.

Not without labor and sacrifice have their virtues been acquired. Blessed be the obedience they have walked in! Blessed be the faith that has led them, and the hope that has inspired them! Upon the foundation that the Spirit has built through the means of their faithful toil, are we called to add stone upon stone, until the part allotted to us in the glorious structure be completed, to serve in its turn as a basis for coming generations. For, ever increasing is the work of God, ever offering to those who will be successively called into it, new truths and larger spheres of action, until the house of our God will indeed become a house of prayer, for all nations, kindreds, tongues and people, for all classes of mind and conditions of spirit, whether produced by inheritance, education, or any other cause. This view is a happy unfoldment of the somewhat narrower ideas held by our predecessors, from Jesus of Nazareth down to Ann of Manchester and her followers, the founders of our order. The former declared that he was sent only in relation to the lost sheep of Israel, an idea, naturally enough, flowing from a Jewish education, and evidently true in regard to himself personally, but which would have been a grave mistake, if generally adhered to in succeeding ages, to avoid which a special revelation had to be made to Peter.

The latter came out from the religious organizations, the various so-called Christian denominations of their day, and felt, also, naturally enough, as though their class, religious professors generally, were called in a particular manner, almost to the exclusion of others, to inherit the blessings of Christ's true kingdom; whereas the rational mind of our day tells us, that the mere profession of a false Christianity is, by no means, a better preparation for the acceptance of the life of the true one, than an honest denial, or an absolute ignorance of those former errors would be, but rather the reverse. For, as it has taken time and efforts to get those errors worked in the mind, so will it also require time and sufferings to eradicate them. Here comes in the advantage of the rationalist; his mind is like a field, well fallowed and clear, ready for the seed of eternal truth which will be sown there and yield rich harvests. The appearances are, that this class will furnish the master-builders of the work that is impending. The son who promised to go to work in his father's vineyard, stands aloof, but he who was contrary and stubborn in his speech, is now repenting and drawing nigh.

Having gone so far, I need but to take another step to answer the questions you put relating to the leading article in the JULY SHAKER. I like that article, because, to me, it contains truth. What was the Sabbathical institution to the Jews, among whom it originated, if not a practical prophecy of a higher order of things? The first one in whom that prophecy was realized, discarded the external institution altogether; he did not need it. His whole life was a continual Sabbath, a life of rest from selfish pursuits, a life of goodness and exceeding love to God and the neighbor—a Shaker life. To those who live that life to-day, the same principles are applicable. They do not need an external Sabbath, because to them it has no meaning, other than they choose to give it themselves. Much less can they have any justifiable interest in having such an institution enforced upon others, contrary to their feelings and convictions, or to their best interests. A day of rest from physical labor may be very good, particularly for those who make such labor and its products the chief object of their lives, and by their selfishness may be tempted to be unjust to themselves or others. One day in seven answers that purpose very well; perhaps one in six might be better still, if all were willing to perform their due part in productive labor. For if any individual or people should consider it best for them to divide the one day of rest between the others and thus lessen each day's toil, why should not they have a right to do so, without being interfered with or imposed upon by others? The French, in their first revolution, missed it in making their period of labor too long, nine days out of ten. Neither men nor beasts could thrive under it, as their experience of twelve years fully proved. I can see nothing improper in any man or class of men ordering their time and dividing their labor to suit their best convenience. Neither can I see any thing right or proper in any man or class of men trying to impose their particular views on this or any other subject upon other men, or dictate for them the way of passing their time, unless it be to restrain them from doing wrong to themselves or their fellows. The barbaric law that might makes right is so inherent in human nature, that it will work out in some way or other, but it never yet wrought any good, nor do I think that it will in the future.

As for the real Sabbath of humanity, the higher life of Christian purity and virtue, I feel that its joy will be an everlasting rejoicing, and its rest an everlasting peace, that not even differences in opinion and mental constitution can destroy. I thank you for your ideas in the AUG. No. of our paper, concerning ART. The abuse and prostitution that it is so much subjected to, makes me sad. The same is but too true about the literature of our day. Humanity will yet look back with shame upon the mental appetites that could crave such food. * * *

Truly yours, etc.,

EMIL BRETZNER.

CANTERBURY, N. H.: The Washing Machines of Shaker Village, N. H., on exhibition at the Centennial, have called out considerable comment and commendation. We hope, that, as they are the best the world has ever produced, they may sell hundreds of them. See advertisement.

LACONISM.

—O—
THEO. OORHAM.

THE Spartans, or Lacedemonians, whose country was called Laconia, systematically endeavored to confine themselves to sententious brevity in speaking and writing. Hence the word Laconic.

Have we any thing to learn from those people? Some may object to studying, as example, a people with whom stealing ranked as a virtue. A concise brevity pervades the writings of nearly all the ancient philosophers. And who would not be a philosopher—a lover of wisdom? Could the sayings of the Nazarene be condensed, yet contain the ideas?

When Alexander, standing before Diogenes, said to him, "What can I do for you?" Diogenes replied, "Stand out of my sunshine." Laconic, but scarcely civil. But what could Alexander expect from a cynic who lived in a tub?

"Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay." Let your answer be short but soft—not sharp.

Some one has said, "an article may be long, yet concise." An invisible prompter says, "very true."

Laconicism is worthy of consideration only as it implies not writing a volume when a page would answer the purpose. "Veni, vidi, vici"—I came, I saw, I conquered—the memorable words of Cæsar—contain more than many of our modern generals, in their Indian wars, could say in as many pages of foolscap.

When humans turn the battle to the gate—the physical sword into the sword of truth, and fight the evil in their own souls, they will be able to overcome the evil in others, without injuring them in body or soul.

THE "NEW DEPARTURE" OF SPIRITUALISTS.

J. M. PEEBLES, in the R. P. Journal for September 9, writes a most stirring defense of the Organization of Spiritualists lately inaugurated at Philadelphia. His arguments in favor of the name adopted by the organization—Christian Spiritualists—embrace a brilliant effort. But hear how he descants of the present status and needs of genuine spiritualism:

It cannot be denied that a partial eclipse has gradually crept over and dimmed the heaven-illuminated face of Spiritualism. The original National Association is dead; nine-tenths of the lyceums are dead; multitudes of Spiritualists are morally dead, attending neither Spiritualist lectures Sunday, nor spiritual seances on week day evenings. The finances that ought to go to erect spiritual halls, support the Spiritualist press, genuine mediums and lyceums for our children, are often expended in building sectarian churches, or supporting the liberal denominations. What is to be done? What does the "new departure" mean? It means—departure from death and indifference to life and spiritual activity—a departure from frothy words to noble deeds—from irreligious scoffing to religious aspirations and manly efforts—from phenomenal wonder-seeking to a rational philosophy and practical righteousness and from an egotistic ignorance to a broad spiritual culture. It is a departure from old feuds, old grievances, old disputations, and thread-bare issues, that have about as much to do with the heavenly truth of Spiritualism as Aztec pottery has to do with poetry.

WHAT LACK I YET?

A sensible inquiry! For nearly thirty years we have listened to the "rappings," and witnessed the phenomena. What lack I yet? Religion, religious culture, moral principle, self-sacrifice, soul consecration, striving enthusiasm, the martyr's zeal, the charity which thinketh no evil, the love that flamed in John's soul while leaning upon the bosom of Jesus, and that unfaltering devotion to truth that has characterized the regal-souled of all ages.

PHYSIOLOGICAL.

—O—
WHAT IS IN THE BEDROOM.

IF two persons are to occupy a bedroom during the night, let them step on a weighing-scale as they retire, and then again in the morning, and they will find that their actual weight is, at least, a pound less in the morning. Frequently there will be a loss of two or more pounds, and the average loss throughout the year will be a pound of matter, which has gone off from their bodies, partly from the lungs, and partly through the pores of the skin. The escaped matter is carbonic acid and decayed animal matter or poisonous exhalation. This is diffused through the air in part, and part absorbed by the bed-clothes. If a single ounce of cotton wool be burned in a room, it will so completely saturate the air with smoke that one can hardly breathe, though there can hardly be 1 oz. of foreign matter in the air. If an ounce of cotton be burned every half hour during the night, the air will be kept continually saturated with smoke, unless there be an open window or door for it to escape. Now the 16 oz. of smoke thus formed is far less poisonous than the 16 of exhalations from the lungs and bodies of two persons who have lost a pound in weight during the eight hours of sleeping; for, while the dry smoke is mainly taken into the lungs, the damp odors from the body are absorbed both into the lungs and into the pores of the whole body. Need more be said to show the importance of having bedrooms well ventilated, and of thoroughly airing the sheets, coverlids and mattresses in the morning before packing them up in the form of a neatly-made bed?—Science of Health.

WISDOM VINDICATED.—Now comes a physiologist who, unlighted by the lamp of a fish diet, proclaims to mankind that apples are the proper food, after all, of the sedentary brain workers. The apple, according to this observer, who obviously investigates things to the core, contains more phosphorus, or brain sustenance, than any other member of the vegetable republic; therefore it is conducive to mental activity.

HASTE AND HEALTH.—It is not at all wholesome to be in a hurry. Locomotives are reported to have moved a mile a minute for short distances. But locomotives have often come to grief for such great rapidity. Multitudes in their haste to get rich are ruined every year. The men who go maturely, slowly, deliberately, are the men who oftenest succeed in life; people who are habitually in a hurry generally have to do things twice over. The tortoise beats the hare at last. Slow men seldom knock their brains out against a post. Foot-races are injurious to health, as all forms of competitive exercise; steady labor in the field is the best gymnasium in the world. Either labor or exercise carried to exhaustion or prostration, or even great tiredness, expressed by "fagged out," always does more harm than the previous exercise has done good.

All running up-stairs or to catch a vehicle or ferry-boat, is extremely injurious to every age, sex, and condition in life. It ought to be the most pressing necessity which should induce a person over fifty to run over twelve or fifteen yards. Those live longest who are deliberate, whose actions are measured, who never embark in an enterprise without sleeping over it, and who perform all the everyday acts with kindness. Quakers are proverbially calm, quiet people; and they are a thrifty folk the world over. This is a common sense advice, and if followed will always prove beneficial to men, and women, too.

FOR HEALTH.—Dress to meet the weather. Eat to satisfaction, no more; and of materials that strengthen the outer man and woman, and incite the inner to the heavenly—health of body and soul. Sleep eight hours, and the sleep of the justified. ☆

THE SHAKER.

Monthly—60 cents per annum.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

SHAKERISM—CHRISTIANITY.

—o—

THAT Shakerism has endured, intact in organization, for one hundred years and more, must appear to any one given to much thought, as one, if not the greatest wonder of our world. Its primal principle of celibacy, having no connection with any order that recognizes Christianity in marriage or reproduction, has been left to rely upon whomsoever has ripened for the resurrection harvest; and, acting from the most free agency of the soul, has chosen to live a life above the elements of this world. With the world opposed to it by principle, it has nevertheless been sustained, without doubt, providentially, for past, present and future purposes. With no people on the earth, equal in physical or moral character to the Jews who received the gospel direct from Jesus, Shakerism—the second and improved edition or proclamation of Christ to the world,—has had to meet barriers, which it is almost certain Jesus never met with. True Christianity has ever been persecuted; yet never so much by its own professors and so-called adherents, as it meets from such to-day. Shakerism finds less encouragement in the physical organization of humanity now, than Christianity ever met with before. With manifold diseases, of which the Jews never knew, and a precocious tendency to evils exceeding any ever mentioned in the catalogues of Mosiac times, Shakerism rises, and calls the people to a repentance of their evils, not only, but to a plane of life superior, physically and spiritually, to even the best of ancient days! Will there be a sufficient number reply, to keep the ark—the organization—in a progressive, working order? At the present time, only a few, comparatively speaking, are acquainted with the purposes of the Shaker Order. By far, the majority look upon it as an organization of religious fanatics, born to an ephemeral existence, and to go down from sheer exhaustion. It is difficult, even for those most familiar with our views, to realize it as a pressing necessity of salvation in the world. Millions who think they worship Jesus, are unwilling to give a thought to the fact, that Shakerism teaches no more nor less than did Jesus. If genuine Christianity was ever a necessity as a saviour to the world, it certainly is needed now.

As a transcendent principle to marriage, it invites to the most unselfish celibacy. As a superior rule to war, resistance, retaliation, it urges nonresistance, and a peace that "passes all the understanding" of worldly peace; and instead of permitting the people to live in the deception that the narrow, marital circle is most unselfish, it presents a relationship where all, who live as Jesus lived, are one family, and equally worthy as brethren and sisters in Christ life—none rich nor poor; no masters nor slaves; no landlords nor tenants, but all workers for God and humanity. Just what original Christianity proposed for the people, Shakerism proposes, with a blessed increase. There is nothing that can be named, where one requires what the other did not. The organization of Shaker Societies is only an increase of the same Christian principles, actively engaged in. Where is there any difference between the Celibacy of the Church of Pentecost and that of the Shaker Church? What difference in their Peace proclamations and lives? Where do they differ concerning Private Property or Personal Poverty? Are the Shakers required to be any more unspotted from the world and worldly associations than were the constituents of the "model church," or its Lord, Jesus? Should Jesus come to earth to-day, where could he find a church where all the members were more zealously striving to imitate his life, and the modes of the "days of pentecost?" We want the people to know of us and our principles. With every added mite of information, there will be a weight of savor—a testimony against every unchristian practice in the role of life—and this is what the world needs and must have. Never was the time when Shaker principles attracted half the attention in the world which they now do. Never were they so favorably viewed, nor so thoroughly used as a lash for the unchristian lives of Christian professors, and with so little persecution. Therefore, let us work, in every way in our power, brethren and friends, for the lifting of a standard that will convince the people of the saving efficacy of practical Christianity.

LET EVERY ONE PREACH.

—o—

WHOEVER feels that he has found the gospel of Christ—a saviour from sin—will feel a strong desire to tell the good news. It is worthy the question, how much are we willing to do for the ransom of souls? It surpasses almost every other good quality in human nature, to see a man or woman, unselfishly devote themselves and their all for the promulgation of truthful principles. We have our doubts raised, immediately, as to the sincerity of any one, who, claiming to have the gospel in possession, yet who are too selfish to use means for its distribution. We know of one man in the city of Troy, N. Y., who has paid nearly or quite seven hundred dollars the past year for the dissemination of spiritualistic ideas. He is not a rich man. Does not own the house he lives in, nor any other. The growth, of what he believes the true gospel to be, is worth nearly a thousand dollars a year to him. How much is it worth to each of us. Every Shaker should feel the necessity of letting the light of our gospel principles shine. Should seek means to make them shine. Should be a preacher. Should so love the gospel, that he or she would spread its knowledge far and near. We have a duty to do in "preaching the gospel to every creature." We must see to it that a knowledge of our principles "goes into all the world." Let us study the best means of distributing truth. The dullards, the half dead and the dying spiritually, will seek to discourage us. But let nothing hinder our putting in our mite, or a million if we can, to aid the progress of genuine Christian principles. "Freely we have received; let us as freely give." Spread the news. Circulate THE SHAKER. Get one more subscriber, each. Make our neighbor a present of it for one year. Help the cause of Christ from your hearts, from your strength, talents, pocket, and none will fail of receiving in basket and store, many times worth the efforts made. Have we the gospel, brethren, "hide not the light under a bushel," but let every copy of THE SHAKER do good service. ☆

IS ANN LEE COME AGAIN?

—o—

THE following article appeared originally in The Isle of Wight "Erwig," and more recently in The London Spiritualist. It will be read with great interest by our thousands of readers. To any one, familiar with the earliest history of our Shakerism, and of our more modern experiences with Spiritualism, the question we ask above will almost force itself upon them. We are very happy that the inclinations of this spiritual movement, called after our unpopular cognomen, should be conducive of such Christian fruits as "each for all, and all for each." Let us watch these Shakers closely; and if we can learn more of Christ from them, than we commonly practice, our watching may lead us to review and reconsider gospel teachings of at least a century ago, and continued on our statutes ever since.

"Love thy neighbor as thyself" was good; yet it was improved by "esteeming others better than yourselves;" and when opportunity is given for the practical demonstration of these Christian principles in commune life, let us all—churches of every denomination professing Christ, and particularly the American Shaker Church—look to our laurels, and "let no one take our crowns."

If the spirit which moves the Girling Shakers be of God, it will inevitably lead them into all godly behavior. And while we hope and pray that it may be a genuine revival of the Pentecostal Spirit, let us, with the light of God now in our possession, be determined that no hills of godliness shall overtop our Mount Zion. ☆

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL PHENOMENA OF THE GIRLING SHAKERS CRITICALLY EXAMINED.

That mesmerism does not furnish an elucidation of the Shaker mystery has been, we consider, conclusively established by a well-known clergyman in a neighboring town, who visited the Shaker party privately during their stay at Portsmouth. From the published account of his visit we extract the following:—

"During the early part of the singing, one of the sisters was noticed to be under influence. With eyes closed, and a quiet, rapt, and beautiful expression of face, she began to speak—mirabile dictu—in Hebrew. She then made signals to another sister, who came over to her, and standing embraced at one time, and kneeling at another, this sister soon came under influence, and began to interpret what the other uttered. Then, after a time, the order was reversed, and the second sister began to speak in Italian, while the first translated for her; and one was voluble in French, who, as I afterward ascertained, knew no French in her normal state, and who while speaking was characteristically French all over. And so prayers, quotations of Scripture, and sweet, sisterly, tender, and playful conversations on spiritual things took place between them in various tongues, together with a little singing of exquisite sweetness— weird and spiritual on the part of one—in what to me appeared like Hindostanee.

"After a time Mrs. Girling herself came under influence, and began to talk in verse or rhyme, for her speech ran in couplets, and there was much ingenuity in making the words jingle. I also found that in her ecstasy she had the power of mind-reading, since she somewhat, and rhythmically, set forth various matters that were uppermost in my thoughts. Much that she said was utter nonsense, of course, but all that was said was said in rhyme, rapidly and with considerable action, which, after a little space, culminated in a positive dance, or easy roundabout jump—arms waving, and lips prodigal of verse at the same time."

The Rev. Thomas Colly has done good and important service to the Shakers, though we suspect the publication of his letter has led them to look upon him somewhat as one who entered their society as a spy. His scholarly training has qualified him to explode the mesmeric theory that the whole Community are poor biologized subjects of the "designing and wicked mother." His visit to the Shakers has scarcely, however, as we think, established a close similitude between their trance phenomena and those obtained through the acknowledged spirit medium. There is, so to speak, a uniqueness about the former, certain constant distinctive features differing from the ordinary spiritual phenomena; such for instance as the beyond measure strange phrase called "passing from life to death, and from death to life," during which, we are assured, the vital functions are often to all appearance completely suspended, and a horrible odor of death emanates from the body, though consciousness is in a measure retained. Again, the spirit mediums, nearly one and all, declare that the exorcise of their medial powers has a very exhausting tendency. The Shakers, on the contrary, constantly assure us that the influence of the spirit which controls them is in the highest degree conducive to bodily health, and that they feel strengthened and refreshed even after one or two hours of continuous dancing; this statement is certainly substantiated by the healthful condition of the family under conditions which would have killed or invalidated for life, at least, one-half of one hundred and twenty persons taken at hap-hazard from amongst us. But there are further differences to perplex and mystify us. We have often heard of the controlling intelligence at spirit circles personating Christ, and even the "Holy Spirit," but we do not remember to have ever heard of the case of a medium who was obsessed by but one spirit only; other spirits invariably intrude, and say their say. On the contrary the Shakers present the astonishing fact of a hundred or more mediums drawn together by some occult influence, all acted upon, as they distinctly assert, solely by an intelligent power that sinks all individuality in the "Holy Spirit." The singularity of the Shaker phenomena does not, however, end even here. The ordinary spiritual medium is a very different person in physical, mental, and moral tendencies to the New Forest Shaker; at least, so far as we can discover. There is the authority of the editor of the Spiritual newspaper for the statement, that a proportion of physical mediums are, either from natural predisposition, or made so by the tyrannical action of the degraded spirits who sometimes surround them, most unlimited liars—the cunning fabricators of complete dramas of malicious fictions, and are the slaves of an abnormal jealousy of each other, so strangely fierce as to have no parallel in any thing ever witnessed among average mortals. This statement is made to apply to mediums who obtain strong physical manifestations, but we have grounds for the opinion that among mediums for the higher intellectual phenomena, there exists a prevalence of moral idiosyncrasies that are often not of an elevating nor unselfish character. Now we have certainly not been able to detect the least evidence of this shocking deceitfulness and intense selfishness, or other minor moral weaknesses, among these Hordle mediums. It is true that some points of resemblance may be discovered between the Shaker phenomena and those witnessed in ecstasies and convulsionaries, vast waves of which strange influence swept over Morzine, on the borders of France, and over Madagascar a few years since, violently affecting immense numbers of their populations; and some still closer points of resemblance can be traced in revivals and "Twirling Glories" of our own country.

After all, however, there is about the Hordle revival outbreak a constant, lofty, practical purpose cropping out of its seemingly ridiculous and weird mysteries, which, together with the abnormal power of endurance it confers, has puzzled men of deep thought and wide experience. The Rev. A. Clissold, an ordained clergyman, and, moreover, a Swedenborgian, and therefore more familiar with ecstatic spiritual phenomena, after watching them with almost persecuting tenacity, acknowledges himself beaten. Mr. Auberon Herbert, another neighbor (a man of wide reputation as a powerful and unconventional thinker), cannot believe in the imposture theory, seeing that he is willing to give them any thing they may require if they will but ask him for it—a severe test to people very often with empty bellies and an empty purse. Mr. Cowper Temple,

"the son of Earl Cowper, nephew of Lord Melbourne, brother-in-law to the Earl of Shaftesbury, step-son of Lord Palmerston, and inheritor of his name and estates," can scarcely be a man likely to lend his interest to a set of "disgusting and blaspheming impostors." They must have fully secured his respect and his confidence in their moral qualities, if nothing more, before he would have permitted one of them to escort Mrs. Cowper Temple, in to dinner. And it was such as these whom the intelligent Christian people of the Island sought to wipe their feet upon.

Supreme as the contempt in which the Shakers are held alike by the "Liberal" and the conservative working-classes, and hated and scorned as they are by nearly all professing Christians, they present to us the much-needed, highly instructive example of a Community of all ages and both sexes holding their property in common; living together amicably, without jars or wrangling, under the noble principle embodied in their motto—"each for all and all for each;" bound together by bonds of attachment, seemingly of almost superhuman strength, supporting them under privations, which to recount, would read more like extravagant fiction than actual human experiences.

In short, Shakerism seems veiled in deeper mystery than either mesmerism or Spiritualism. Its religious aspect is wholly beyond our apprehension, but the outcome which it presents—a party of industrious Communists, cruelly deprived of their means of support, who avow their determination to starve, if need be, rather than become chained slaves to fill the coffers of the Mammonites—challenges our respect and admiration.—The London Spiritualist.

MOTHER GIRLING.

F. W. EVANS.

[We had just put the preceding article in type, when we received from Elder Evans, the following article—an answer to our query, as to what he knew of Mother Girling. Our readers will be pleased with the remarks of this, our radical champion. Whatever Elder Evans says gives a sound of certainty—no half-way dealing nor compromises. It will be observed, however, that when he says "they are the most orthodox," he means an orthodoxy that is heterodox Shakerism. Ed.]

I have corresponded with the Girling woman and her people ever since they were organized. James Haase, a leading member of Mother Girling's household, received faith in Shakerism, and came over from England, to unite with the Society. This led to the Girlingites being called Shakers, in England. They had no right to the name. Of all sects, they are the most orthodox. To them the Protestant Scriptures, just as they stand, are the word of God—Jesus is the Christ. They fully accept his doctrine of physical resurrection—believe he did rise, bodily, from the tomb, and was the first resurrected man; that all true believers will be resurrected as he was, even as Paul and other apostles believed and taught. They hold the physical resurrection as do the Catholics and Protestants. They claim that Jesus has made his second appearance in the Girling woman; that the judgment day is near, in which the dead in Christ are to rise first, but the Girlingites are of those who will be alive at his coming—are, even now, resurrected, so that she and her people will never die physically. They are warning the world, like second adventists, which they really are, and nothing else.

The only difference between them and the popular sects, is, they believe the scriptures, and act accordingly, whilst the protestant sects believe the scriptures, but do not act logically in accordance with that faith or belief.

The Shakers do not hold the scriptures as the word of God (plenarily), nor believe that either Jesus or the apostles were infallible in word or doctrine, as the Pope is said to be.

To the Shakers, the resurrection is rising from the Adamic to the Christ plane—from generation to spiritual celibacy. To them, the kingdom has come, is in the Shaker Order, and with the Shaker people.

In Celibacy; Community of goods; Confession of sins; non-resistance and Spiritualism; the Girlingites hold with the Shakers.

But with the Girlingites, the science of spiritualism is used to induce divers operations in public, exhibiting manifestations of freedom between the sexes bordering upon, or suggestive of Free Love practices. They have ecstatic dancing with endearing embracing, and osculation.

Shakers hold that spiritualism, and the spirits of the old prophets, or modern ministering angels, should be subject to the testimony of Jesus and Ann; that even under the operation of the most sacred gifts of God, it is good for a man not to touch a woman, in any such physical manner as is peculiar to Free Love Spiritualists, Girlingites or the Oneida Community.

First, pure; then peaceable. Second, pure in spirit, avoiding even the appearance of sensuality, is the Shaker motto.

THE GREAT PEACE (?) CONVENTION.

We hoped large results from the first decade meeting of the so-called "Universal Peace Union," lately held in Philadelphia, and at which we had two delegates—Elders F. W. Evans and Henry Cummings—but are sorry to say that, as a Peace assembly, it was a positive failure. We have studiously pored over The Voice of Peace reports, and are surprised at such a waste of time, opportunity and breath, and the production of so little in the interests of Peace. We learn from other individuals at the meetings, that an inharmenious spirit was continually present. Men and women may cry "Peace, Peace;" but there will be no Peace," until they defeat the devil of war in his kingdom—in the lusts of humanity. (See James, 4:1.) All beating round the bush is valueless; all trimming of the war tree unprofitable; all issue of proclamations and resolutions are unworthy the paper upon which they are written, compared to the "putting away the causes of war"—the lusts for the flesh and for land. Elder Evans did his duty. We quote from the Voice of Peace some of his remarks, the best portions of which were excluded, being too radically right for such a Peace advocate:

Elder Frederick W. Evans, Shaker, said:

The real causes of war that exist in the human soul itself, that have made Christian men and women, and Christian nations, hate one another, so that they have been engaged in war and fighting as a business of life for the last eighteen hundred years, are still unknown.

THREE KINDS OF WAR.

So long as good and evil, truth and falsehood, right and wrong, vice and virtue exist and are mixed together, as in Christendom to-day, there will be war in some form.

Was not Jesus as really the Prince of War as he was the Prince of Peace? He came, not to bring Peace, but a sword—a fire—to set at variance the members of the same family, sect and nation.

The first form of war is physical, produced by the lusts of generation—killed or be killed—Indian warfare. This is the common form of war in all Christian and Pagan nations.

The second form of war is that wherein one man, inspired by a strong influence, will chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight. Thus Sampson slew his hundreds, and Saul and his armor-bearers defeated a whole army. Thus inspired, as a Jew, by the Jewish spirit, Jesus overpowered the traders and the traffickers of the temple.

The third form of war is spiritual war. In this form man uses no physical strength nor carnal weapon. The slaughter is performed entirely by spiritual means. (See 2d Kings, 19-35.) The Angel of the Lord—Spirit—went out and smote, in the camp of the Assyrians, in one night 185,000.

Spirits, using Elias as medium, slew two companies of fifty men each.

These fighting spirits were not yet converted to the still higher form of warfare which Christ's spirits wage against the causes of physical war existing in the people, the causes by which the disciples sought to use Jesus and themselves, to destroy all the people of a village, to do as Elias had done before them—bring down fire from the spirit world.

At that time, when under the CHRISTIAN influence Jesus saw the subject of war as he had never seen it before; saw that what he had done in the temple was Jewish, not Christian, and even now to do as Elias had done would still be Jewish; saw that the mission of the SON OF MAN was not to destroy men's lives, but to destroy the evils of their lives; saw that his disciples, by Jewish education, knew not what spirit they were influenced by in what they asked.

As a Christian, Jesus said: "He that hateth his brother is a murderer—already a warrior."

In CHRIST—not in Jesus—nor in Ann Lee—are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. These are the treasures we need and want—a spiritual righteousness that will make each man and woman righteous.

Being converted, we become such Peace people that even civil war could not turn us aside. They will not fight. These should be heard in a Peace Convention.

The true friends of Peace seek, in their own souls, for the roots of the evil tree in human nature, that has made war a permanent institution in all Church and State governments, from the time that Peter drew his sword to the presentation of the sword to the Peace Convention to be made in a plowshare.

To these roots the axe of truth and self-denial—pure Christianity must be laid. They that learn whoso hateth a brother and killeth a man with a Damascus blade, or whose muscular strength is increased by spirits, so that he kills a dozen, or who becomes the means through whom hundreds are slaughtered, without being touched by visible man or woman, is equally and unqualifiedly a murderer.

Those spirits that wrought the will of the Lord of Hosts—the Hebrew God—empowering Moses to conquer the whole military power of Egypt, without striking a single physical blow, were not Christ spirits.

Poverty is one cause of national wars. The bounty, the wages, the booty and the beauty are inducements to enlistments for men who have no home nor property of their own. Monopoly of land, speculation and usury create poverty. The unreplicable exclusion of women from citizenship, from helping to frame and execute the laws by which she is governed, makes poverty-producing institutions a possibility. Purgation of civil government from all kinds of theology, and instituting abstract radical truths as the basis of Church and State, will ultimately abolish war from the nations of the earth, so that they will learn war no more.

The Union of so many independent States in North America is prophetic of the ultimate union of all nations. There will be a constitution of nations, as we have a constitution of States—a constitution of constitutions. Then there will be Peace on earth and good will among men.

The causes of war—exclusion of citizens from citizenship, monopoly of life elements, poverty and crime, struggle between capital and labor and theological strife, false theology, will all be convicted by Divine Revelation, the rock upon which the new Church and State will be built.

In the darkest hour through which a human soul can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this is at least certain; if there be no God and no future state, yet, even then, it is better to be generous than selfish, better to be chaste than licentious, better to be true than false, better to be brave than to be a coward.—Fredrich William Robertson.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—o—

THE page of Religio-Philosophical Journal, devoted to "Voices from the People," is a most interesting feature of that paper. Between the communications are inserted valuable materials for thought—jewels of the first water.

There has been considerable commotion in some circles, concerning our name—THE SHAKER. Some have suggested a change, the better to meet objections, which others, "not of our fold as yet," have to the title. Be it remembered, that whatever name we may assume, the change (which is not likely to occur) will in no manner mean a compromise of Shaker principles. We shall be open to the same objections so far as our life and teachings are concerned, and the change of name, if made, would not make the doctrines, which urge the cross of Christ on the people, any more palatable. Ever since the gospel of Shakerism was introduced, men and women have appealed to us to pull down our colors—"come down from that cross"—all of which means depart from radical Shakerism. THE SHAKER, under any other title, would still remain objectionable to the carnally minded. Still, let the people send us suggestions.

Great is science. The guests of certain hotels at Rye Beach, N. H., having been prostrated by sickness, Professor Nichols proved, beyond dispute, that the cause was the impurity of the ice used. Among the valuable conclusions arrived at by the professor, we find: 1. That water is in no degree purified by freezing. 2. That water which is unfit to drink as water, should never be used as ice, for human consumption. Let us have a care.

We hope the friends of THE SHAKER will act upon the determination to double its present circulation. We may not have millionaires as subscribers; but we know we have hundreds of large-hearted humanitarians. For sixty cents each, we may call many blessings down on our neighbors. "Love thy neighbor as thyself;" either induce a subscription from him, or present him with a copy for a year.

OUR readers will be edified by our presentation of "CORRESPONDENCE." The breathings of every individual, writing to this office, are of choice rendering and justly appreciated. The correspondence to the various societies would make a grand page every month, could we obtain it. Once in a great while we get an anonymous scrap from some theological critic, etc., that is not so agreeable, but we get hundreds of the appreciative, where we get one of this kind.

ANGEL OF DEATH.

—o—

ANGEL OF DEATH.—Spiritualists can smile at the approach of the angel of death, for it is to them a birth into joys everlasting, and they know that loved ones linger near to assist the weary spirit to pass from the old house to the new; they can meet the change with rejoicing, knowing that just before them lies a field of usefulness, that will yield pleasures to the faithful soul.—John Murray, in the Olive Branch.

That depends altogether on circumstances whether Spiritualists can smile at the approach of death. Some whom we know, we think would feel very badly, if death were staring them in the face; knowing that their life has been of that character fitting them only for the dark regions of the spirit world; they don't care to pass from this sphere of existence. Indeed, it is much easier to purify the spirit here, by seeking the forgiveness of those you have injured, and forgiving those who have wronged you in turn, than to pass to spirit life without accomplishing that object. Spiritualists should learn that it is a calamity to the spirit, to die without being prepared for the change, or failing to accomplish its mission.—R. P. Journal.

This criticism of the R. P. J. is very tardy in coming, but it is a worthy and needed rebuke to many thousands of Spiritualists, who think the spirit world an unalloyed elysium, for even the worst of characters. Not so; but there are hells—"dark regions" as well as heavens there, and every one will go "to his or her own place." "Like will gather to like" there. God is no respecter of persons, but he is a regarader of characters; and in the economy of the spirit world, even more than in this, God has drawn lines of demarcation impassable by the evil, to the disturbance of the good. We thank the Journal, and ask Spiritualists to TAKE NOTICE. ☆

PRAYER.

—o—

PROF. TYNDALL does not believe in the power of prayer to alter the material laws of the universe, and very probably he is right. We do not indorse him, for the reason that our knowledge of the universe is limited. But when ROMEO prayed that the sun might not rise and separate him from his beloved JULIET, the sun rose all the same and divided the lovers forever. What a million of men pray for another million of men pray against. One man wants rain, but another wants sunshine. How can local interests affect the wisdom of Heaven? Is it possible that Providence hesitates between its clients, and says to JAMES, whose arid potato field is withering for want of water, "Dear JAMES, it will rain to-night," and to SMITH, whose hay is not yet stacked, "Dear SMITH, your hay will all be soaked." No; these are the effects of prayer which are not logical in the mind, and so far the challenge of Prof. TYNDALL, to have one hospital prayed for and the other prescribed for, must be held to be likely to result to the advantage of his theory. Prayer, however, while it cannot influence material laws, may affect those unknown spiritual laws which have so much to do with our mysterious nature. Who has not prayed for some desired end? A dying child, a dying wife, relief, perhaps, from some trouble. There is a story of a poor woman who prayed for a loaf of bread, and her prayer was indirectly answered by a drunken party of men, who, in sport, threw a loaf down her chimney. No one can solve these mysteries, for there are men of this world and men of the next world. When the entire Christendom of humanity kneels every Sunday in church and implores Heaven for especial blessings, is that ceremony a farce? If it is a useless supplication then one-half of our religion is a mockery. People say that every wish is a prayer, but that statement is a mistake. A wish is only the desire for a result; a prayer is a request for a reply. We want rain badly now. The earth is dead with drought, and the crops will suffer from the lack of water. Shall we pray that the heavens may be opened and the mechanical laws of the universe be suspended for our particular benefit? Certainly we have the right to demand, but it is doubtful if we possess the reason to expect compliance. In our churches on Sunday prayers for rain will be probably offered, and if the rain comes the eloquence of the clergyman will be held in high estimation by his congregation, and if it fails then Providence must take the responsibility. Our own humble opinion is, that if we look for rain in this unhappy drought we had better study the weather reports, which at least indicate probabilities. When we kneel in reverence to that inscrutable Power, which is above us all, let our supplications be for spiritual blessings more than for earthly gains.

THE WAY OF LIFE.

ENFIELD, N. H.

1st. The way of life is free for all, 'Tis o - pen, plain and clear, And lov - ing - ly a voice doth call For souls to en - ter here.
 2d. The power that sets the spirit free, From slavery's chains of woe, Is found, in Zion still to be, Where souls, its worth may know
 3d. Then come ye heavy-laden souls, The way of life pursue, Eternal bliss, the way unfolds, And gifts divine and true.

1st. To take the sin-destroying cross, That Je-sus meek - ly bore, And rise tri - umphant from their loss, Through blest redemption's door.
 2d. The means, whereby this power becomes A saving grace to man, Is wrought through full obedience To God's perfected plan.
 3d. A recompense, excelling far, The trials of the way, Will meet the Zion traveler, In realms of endless day.

"I thank you heartily for saying you hope I shall get well. I mean to get well, and shall do all in my power to accomplish it. But I don't pray for it any more than you, in the sense you write the words. To me prayer is a natural and most delightful exercise. It is thus: I feel conscious of the presence of the Infinite power, mind, and love, which makes and governs the universe; I feel that it is close to me; then, conscious of that dear Presence, I think over the blessings I have and the use I make of them, I remember the many things I have done, and I think of the right things I ought to do, I recollect my joys and my sorrows, my hopes and my fears.

"So my prayer is an act of gratitude, of penitence (if I have done wrong), of aspiration and of joy. But it is not an act of petition. I don't ask God to do my work; to saw my wood; to write my books, or to make me a good man. Now, with this notion of prayer, I should no more ask God to restore my health, than I should to buy me a cargo of tea. I am amazed that men should think their feeble words can alter the mind of the Almighty God, and, still more, that they should dare to do it if they could. If I thought it was God's desire that I should die, to-day, but that my asking for life would lead him to let me live thirty years more, I should not dare to put my little mind against his infinite wisdom, and ask for life."

"THE WORLD'S SAGES, INFIDELS AND THINKERS."

THE Book reviewer of THE SHAKER says of this extraordinary work: "We congratulate the publisher, and the public generally, on account of the good judgment displayed in supplying so copious and compact a compilation (1000 pages) in one volume. It is a biography of the greatest minds that ever lived; and is intended as an improver of minds of this and every country. We trust that the publisher will be well repaid for the arduous labors he has made for the moral and mental development of all classes. It is a valuable treasure. SOCIETY RECORD.

—O—

PLEASANT HILL: A beautifully written letter from Elder B. B. Dunlavy, of this place, informs us of a dreadful fire—the large barn with all its contents—probably the work of incendiaries! From twelve to fifteen thousands of dollars' worth of property gone, doing none any good! While many more thousands of dollars' worth must be used in replacing buildings for the care of their stock. When we think that God is just, we tremble for the incendiary, more, much more, than for the murderer. With all the mental sufferings brought on by this calamity, a prayerful spirit for the guilty party or parties is manifested; and a gratefulness that it is no worse. Says Elder Benjamin:

"But, beloved friends, we have a fine growing season. Corn looks well, potatoes greatly abound, grass is luxuriant, and our apple orchards are bending and breaking under their enormous load of fruit while our broom corn harvest has commenced—a heavy crop. So that we have much left to be thankful for—thankful that our chastisement was not heavier—thankful that the earth abounds in plenty—thankful that general health and buoyant spirits prevail; and thankful that we have the gospel of Christ, which is better than all, because it secures to the honest soul the durable riches which the fires of earth cannot consume, and no power can take from us, if we will make it our own, which we have the power to do, and will do. While earthly riches make to themselves wings, and fly away, the treasures of heaven abide in the soul forever! As our dear friends have been well tried in the school of adversity by passing through the fiery ordeal, we do not need to speak of our spiritual status, as they are fully able to comprehend the situation, under the influence of such a revulsion. We could take in scores of the floating population, but they generally prove to be bad fish; good ones are remarkably scarce. No moving of the outside waters in this region, to cause the lepers to step in to be healed."

MT. LEBANON, N. Y.: The annual "Social Gathering" of the Novitiate Orders lately took place, as usual—resulting with an increase of blessings over any former meetings! Dr. J. V. Mansfield was an invited guest, and gave many wonderful tests of answering sealed letters. Elder F. W. Evans thinks there can be no doubt, that the doctor is a genuine, truthful spiritualist, and most worthy man.

THOMAS BEAL, of Shakers, N. Y., sends his compliments and thanks to Larz Erickson, for his excellent article in September number of SHAKER, and proposes to have the last half of said article painted in large letters, and placed over the door of his shop. We know of a good many who might be drawn nearer the kingdom of heaven by having the closing sentiments of "THE DISCIPLINE OF GOODNESS" placed where they could read them when they run.

THE desire for women modifies the Darwinian law of brute force in man; otherwise, under that force, man would kill all women. Her lord and master's passions balance each other * * * *

LIGHT ENOUGH.

E. T. LEGGETT.

What thousands, blinking like the birds of night,
Dazed by the brilliance of o'erpowering light,
With slumbering eyelids, grope the green earth o'er,
And in full floods of light still sigh for more:
Not light they need; could all the suns that glow,
In one concentered, brighten all below,
They'd still complain; for all is dark within;
No ray illumines their citadel of sin.

Not light is wanting; light is everywhere;
Each tree 's a sermon and each flower a prayer:
Earth, seas, and skies, the seasons as they roll,
Teach man's whole duty to each reasoning soul.
The light, that at its dawn, ere man was free,
Led saints of old from death to victory.
From heaven to earth, from God to man to-day,
Still dazzling shines upon the better way.

No light has dimmed, no fountain ceased to flow;
No truth 's involved that man has need to know;
No law has changed, rewarding good or ill;
All ill is Hell,—all good is Heaven still:
No chord is missing from earth's glad refrain;
No link is broken in earth's golden chain;
Still, as the sunbeams, angels come and go,
With smiles to cheer and balm for every woe.

That soul, of all is happiest and best,
Who, blessing others, is in others blest:
In every sphere where men or angels are,
True happiness is true religion there:
He who conforms in body, mind and soul
To all God's laws imposed for his control,
Or prince, or peasant, be his station given,
Wherever he may be, to him is heaven.

'Tis folly to resist, where man is wrong;
Man is too weak for treason—God too strong;
Omnipotence is His with all the spheres;
To Him eternity's unending years;
Let's then be wise before it's all too late,
Acknowledge God and keep the laws of Fate;
With heart and hand join with the hosts above,
Who less know God is great, than God is love.

MAKE ROOM FOR TRUTH.

GILES B. AVERY.

[The following excerpts are from a private letter, made without permission of the writer. But they contain so much truth, and the evidences of the "passing away of old heavens," together with the needed rebuke to stereotyped religionists, that we make bold to use them, as the property of God and his people everywhere.—Ed.]

* * * WHY, we know of many people who believe enough gospel truth to save them from sin, and in their obedience are saved from sin, who nevertheless are very limited in their knowledge of fundamental principles of truth, which other souls would have to be convinced of before they could take one step in the way of God. And these fundamentals are of such vast importance, that a want of their recognition has riveted the handcuffs, whet the guillotines and spiked the torture casks of nations of inquisitors, who, for what they call heresy, have tortured until death, millions of human beings, and retarded the advent of Christ's second appearing for hundreds of years!

The probability is, that nine-tenths of those who have enough truth to save them from sin do not see the least impropriety of having as a requisite for eligibility to office in the United States' government that a man should believe in God—no matter if it was the God of the Presbyterians or Trinitarians, claiming that some are elected to heaven from all eternity, let them sin as much as they choose, while others, never so righteous, would be damned, by the decrees of God, to all eternity! They cannot see the point that this requisite of eligibility to civil office would create a State standard of religious belief, and terminate in the adoption of capital punishment or the inquisition for what said officials might denominate heresy. They cannot see that such requisite would fix upon a specific God-idea or God-character as the God to be believed, to the exclusion of every other, and that thus liberty of conscience would be at once abridged, aye, annihilated! * * *

Now, if we should be so conservative as to render nothing which this class of minds would object to, what possible avenue would be open for the continuous revelation of truth, which is what our Shaker gospel claims as a foundation principle of Shaker faith? We confess we cannot see said avenue.

Many cannot see why the least objection should be raised to the authority exercised in closing the world's exhibition on some particular denomination's Sabbath, while to carry out in justice such a system of freedom of conscience as Shaker religion claims as Christianity, the exhibition at Philadelphia should either be opened every day of the week, or closed every day!

But some ask: "What has Shakerism to do with it?" Why, the domain of Shaker testimony and duty covers every moral and religious phase of human error—sin, and it cannot do less than this, to be a gospel of full salvation from all sin.

It has been said: "He cannot live rightly, whose faith is wrong." Abstractly considered, this is true, yet relatively it is erroneous. A good degree of righteousness may be attained unto by a living obedience to principles, which originates a faith which those so living do not sufficiently understand either to believe or disbelieve. Hence we have, relatively speaking, righteous life without faith; however paradoxical, it is true. * * * Jesus was a heretic, judged by the religious law of the Jews. Ann Lee was a heretic, according to the theology of the Church of England. Father James Whittaker was a heretic by the standard that justified Abijah Wooster and others in their old heavens religion when Father said: "Abijah, go and bury your Christ, for he stinks!" This was the Christ of a religion which justified any in living only a Pauline quality of Christianity. Jesus anticipated the proclivity in human nature to create gods, and the tendency to worship him as God, hence called himself the "Son of Man." Ann Lee did the same, and often rebuked the tendency to worship her by saying: "Don't kneel to me, but kneel to God; I am but your fellow-servant." * * *

Shakerism is a recognition—

1. Of one God, dual in principle, spirit in esse.

2. Revelation of God through human and angelic media.

3. This revelation has been in progress from time unknown.

4. It is manifested to our age through Jesus Christ's example and teachings.

5. Additionally manifested through Mother Ann Lee.

6. Continued in manifestation through their faithful followers.

7. The evidences of these manifestations being of God, and Christian, will be in harmony with, and in support of, principles of truth revealed by preceding media, which have been tested as savory by life experiences.

8. Shakerism is a theology which conserves all preceding revelations of truth, while it continues to reveal truth as fast as humanity (individually or collectively) can be developed to comprehend the wisdom of God. * * *

NOTES BY THE WAY — NO. 4.

TRIFLES.

—O—

H. C. BLINN.

ON my desk, by the hand of some kind friend,
I find "Trifles," and the last verse says:

"It is the little sins
Lead to great wickedness;
In little deeds that bless
The highest good begins."

Trifles! Well, in the common acceptance of the term it may be perfectly correct, but they ultimate in a magnitude as extended as the whole world. From these trifles spring all the thorus that so seriously afflict poor fallen man on his journey through life. No better sermon could be preached for the redemption of the world than is contained in these four simple lines.

Avoid the little sins, the lovely sins, the darling sins—those nearest to our own hearts, and so near that we almost fail to recognize but that they are a part of our being, and we shall never have cause to mourn over those of "great wickedness."

Sin, like every thing else, grows by cultivation. It may be petted and flattered in the days of infancy, but as it develops on the right hand and on the left, it often frightens us long before the age of maturity; and unless it can be arrested, it becomes in advanced years a frightful monster, and, "to be hated, needs only to be seen" in that state.

He who wrote in the good book that "man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward," illustrates with much accuracy our present condition in life. In this latter day it seems to be inherent in the very germ of our being. If, however, it could be arrested in infancy, there might be more of an encouraging hope of the promised millennium. But while there is so much to encourage not only "little sins," but sins of magnitude, it needs an army of peace-makers to speak peace and to proclaim the gospel of "good news."

The crude and even vulgar manner in which many of the revolting crimes are heralded through the land is no doubt often the active stimulus of other deeds of darkness. Shaker villages are by no means so far removed from these messengers of wrong living and wrong-doing but that they are obliged to share, to some extent, in the malaria.

Editors and others may perhaps be warranted in saying that they publish what the people wish to read; but it must be a sad and morbid state of the mind that can dwell with satisfaction over the rehearsal of crime. The warning voice of the testimony of our gospel work is in its every breath against it, as well as against the fascinating sensational literature that is sweeping like a deluge over the land.

There may be those who, for the "little" or the large sins that they may meet in this line, would feel no condemnation for either the writing or reading—indeed, no more than they would for bearing false witness, or for coveting their neighbor's goods; but as we would not wish to be judged by this standard of mind, we peril our souls and the prosperity of our Christian cause in proportion as we cherish the sins of the world.

The relief, yea, the sunshine to this unpleasant picture, comes from the "little deeds that bless." In this the peace-maker finds all that his willing heart is able to do, sowing seeds of kindness—deeds of love. It is a development of the spirit of Christ in the soul which reads: Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you.

While there is such an extended field of usefulness spread out before us, it would seem unfortunate that he who has the least light from God should either hide or squander it through the influence of a less worthy cause. Better would it be in the consecration of our lives to the spirit of good, that whatever we do, it may be as a protest against the little as well as large sins of the world, and ever for the exaltation of our high calling.

CHANGE THE SABBATH DAY.

—O—
F. W. EVANS.

I PROPOSE that the American government change the Sabbath to any day of the week, except the Jewish or the Mahometan Sabbath day. The pagan Sun-day is of all others the most improper.

As Shakers, I and my people observe it as a day of rest with as much fidelity as any people. As an American citizen, proclaiming liberty of conscience to all mankind, I protest against the sectarian, superstitious closing of the world's exhibition on Sun-day. It is not the true scriptural Sabbath.

The government did right in blowing up Hell Gate on the Sabbath. Let the Christian clergy blow up the gates of hell—religious controversy; let the world's exposition be open, free of expense, to the world's poor on the remaining Sabbath days, and henceforth keep hands off the only government constitutionally free from sectarian theology. Then they may keep any day, and as many Sabbath days as they please, unmolested.

And we—Jews, Quakers, Catholics, materialists, atheists, Protestants—will all unite and keep any day the American government may appoint as a day of rest to man, beast and cook.

CHOICE OF TREASURES.

—O—

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures of earth."

EMMA J. NEAL.

That heart which builds for self alone,
The miser's portion gains;
But when its wealth is needed most,
There's nought of worth remains.

When death shall still the throbbing pulse,
And silence action here,
The clink of gold will not appear
In the immortal sphere.

The boatman, from that sylvan shore,
May hear the miser's call,
But cannot bear his pauper heart
Where love o'ershadows all.

No counterfeit wears virtue's mien,
When heartfelt joys unfold;
Eternal gains, with bogus coin,
Cannot be bought nor sold.

Where bloom the fruits of paradise,
True worth e'er gains its prize;
While worldly titles, fame—all lies—
Thrive only in disguise.

Those who so fully are absorbed
Amassing earthly ore,
Of well-filled vaults, they here may boast,
But none of heavenly store.

By giving much the soul grows rich,
Where'er its hands may toil
To build for others homes of health,
Or cultivate their soil.

The philanthropic soul ne'er wants
The miser's golden store;
'Tis blest by blessing others here,
And on the eternal shore.

Then let me choose the "better part,"
The riches God has given—
For Jesus taught, the pure in heart
Should find their wealth in heaven.

Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

JOHN RUSKIN.

—O—

DANIEL FRASER.

OF the many distinguished living Englishmen, there are few who equal John Ruskin as an artist, in literature, as a hater of shams, in honesty of thought and purpose, and in a true appreciation of a want of righteousness in modern civilization.

In his sixty-seventh letter (July, 1876), to the people of England, he dashes off the following outlines: "A civilized nation consists, in broad terms, first, of a mass of half-taught, discontented, and mostly penniless populace, calling itself the people. Second, of a thing it calls a government, an apparatus for collecting and spending money. Third, of capitalists, many of them rogues, and stupid persons. Fourth, of a certain quantity of literary men, saying any thing they can be paid to say—of clergymen, saying any thing they have been taught to say—of philosophers, saying any thing that comes in their heads. Broadly, the civilized nation consists of mobs, money-collecting machines, and capitalists. The capitalist lends the civilized mob money, to buy gunpowder, infernal machines, or any thing else it has set its idiotic mind on, and appoints its money-collecting machines to collect a daily tax thenceforward forever—A National debt."

John Ruskin and his "Companions" have, instead of a debt, begun to collect a National Store. They hold, "That a heap of cannon balls, or a cellar full of gunpowder is not a store, though a heap of potatoes and a cellar full of coals is." Again, "Now, the men who have the teaching of the people in their hands at present tell them that it is not practicable for the government, or money-collecting machine, to buy potatoes, etc., but must buy iron plates two feet thick, gunpowder, and red tape."

"The first condition of companionship is Honesty. The second, to earn our own living, and not allow other people to work for us. First, as necessary to our health and honor; but much more, as striking home at the universal crime of modern society—stealing the laborer's bread, and teaching him pious catechisms, that we may keep him our quiet slave."

"In carrying out the designs of the Society, the person charged with it should be implicitly trusted, and accurately obeyed by the companions. He cannot lose his time in persuasion or contention; he must act undisturbedly, or his mind will not suffice for its toil. Hesitation and opposition might waste and pervert the power of the Society. His authority over them must correspond precisely to that of a Roman Dictator in a war against external enemies. It is not the command of private will, but the dictation of necessary law, which the companion obeys—only, the obedience must be absolute, and without question; faithful to the uttermost."

"The practice of faith and obedience to some of our fellow-creatures is the alphabet by which we learn the higher obedience of heaven; and it is not only needful to the prosperity of all noble, united action, but essential to the happiness of all noble, living spirits. The moral scale is raised according to the degree and motive of obedience. To be disobedient through temptation, is human sin. To be disobedient for the sake of disobedience, is fiendish sin. To be obedient for the sake of obedience, is angelic virtue. Enforcement (of this) must be in the very teeth of the mad-dog's creed of modernism: 'I will not be dictated to,' which contains the essence of all diabolical error."

He suggests, "That the mercenary professions—preaching, law-giving and fighting, be entirely abolished."

We, as a people, cannot but bless every good effort. When the designs of these "companions" are realized, they will but approximate to the work we are in. We have no cannon balls, but heaps of good things; and paid preachers, etc., with us, are as scarce as cannon balls.

The time seems to be drawing near when such men as Friend Ruskin may seek to know the secret of our lives; and we may have to tell them. First, ignoring the action of our sensual—lower self. Second, manifesting to all the higher attributes of our being. Third, loving and blessing those having the charge of affairs, who yield their services without money and without price. To such, we can afford to yield child-like, implicit, angelic obedience.

Allow me to congratulate you, my gospel relations, one and all, that with us is the Order of Heaven; and that we see before us, the fulfillment of prophecy; that Saviours have come up upon Mount Zion, and do judge the Mount of Esau. And while we bless the Saviours of today, by strengthening their hands and hearts, may those of the past be remembered in love and reverence; and emphatically He, who opened the way—"trode the wine-press alone, while of the people, there were none to help." And whose sweet word was, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."

The human spirit who stands in the rectitude and purity of the work we are in, is a "covert from the storm, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land" of wrong and pollution.

Shirley, Mass.

MATERIALISM—SPIRITUALISM. NO. 1.

—O—

W. H. RUSSELL.

THESE terms, as commonly understood, are used to express ideas the direct opposites of each other. Yet, taking them in their original signification, there is no sufficient reason why they should be made to represent ideas so different.

The materialist is one who asserts that there are certain elements in nature, possessing in themselves, separately, neither intellect, will, affection nor passion; yet when, by some mysterious or fortuitous occurrence, they combine to form the human organization, they produce all the phenomena exhibited by the human soul, but disunited, these phenomena, in each individual case, cease forever. This, of course, is mere assumption on his part. The elements of nature, by combination, produce numerous forms—the stately oak and elm, the graceful palm, the slender reed, the plant with its vast variety of flowers, charming by reason of their beauty and splendor of color and delightful fragrance, and the numerous forms of beauty in the mineral and animal kingdoms. The intelligent materialist does not maintain that these formations possess any elements or forces which were not in existence before they assumed their several forms; nor, when dissolved that their elements cease to exist. They may go on combining and shaping themselves into forms of beauty forever.

The chemist combines various elements in nature, and produces results which are not effected by them separately. But behind these are the purpose, judgment and skill of the chemist; and these compounds, in many instances, continue in combination until the same skill is employed to separate them. But when separated, they each retain their natural force. That is never lost, neither in the combination of the elements, nor when they resume their original status. It is just as true that the forces of reason, will, memory, love and affection, and the like, are never lost. The contrary of this the materialist has no means of proving, though his theory requires him to assert that there cannot be thought as we see it displayed in man, unless certain elements which he calls material are combined.

The human organization contains certain substances which all agree to call material because they are perceived to be identical with similar ones existing elsewhere. But the materialist is unable to prove that there do not exist in the human organization, elements, or primary substances, which have, as yet, escaped the scrutiny of the keenest-eyed chemist. What does he mean by the forces of the elements? For aught he knows, may they not be distinct substances combined with what he is pleased to call material elements? When combined, do they add any thing which they did not possess separately? If so, then something is produced where nothing was. So with the forces of the human soul, intellectual, affectional or passion. It cannot be shown that they are not eternal substances, very refined, no doubt, in their nature, which combine with other elements, forming, ultimately, the intelligent, rational, active being that we call man. Nor can it be shown that these forces once combined will not always continue thus, though they may be separated from what are called the material portions.

Just here the materialist and spiritualist diverge. The materialist makes assertions, and it is evident enough that he can do nothing more; for, if there is no existence of the human being when the earthly form is dissolved, it is impossible to know it; but if there is such, then there is a possibility of knowing it; and this knowledge some claim to possess and undertake to make it clear to others. Like all attempts at demonstration, however, this is not equally satisfactory to all persons. What is absolute proof to one is not so to another. The demonstrations of science are such only to those who investigate the facts for themselves; and even to some who attempt to investigate, they furnish no satisfactory proof, because there is not intellectual development sufficient to comprehend them. Many rely upon the statements of those who have proved the truth for themselves; nevertheless, the most satisfactory proof of science, whether physical, intellectual or moral, is that which one acquires for himself and possesses within himself. "Add to your faith knowledge," is advice applicable to every human being. For this the virtues of candor, patience and steady perseverance are necessary. Possessing these, whatever may be his present lack, one may constantly "grow in grace," and in all those things which lead to the knowledge of immortality.

FRUITFULNESS IN THE DIVINE LIFE.

—O—

ELIZABETH H. WEBSTER.

"I will that ye bear much fruit."

To the citizen of the world nothing is more cheering than to witness the evidence of growth around him; if in the city, the improvement and stability of building; the good order, industry and intelligence of community. If a dweller in the open land, his interest is different, but none the less hearty, in the improvement of his surroundings. The oak tree, which his own hands planted in boyhood, has grown to be a shade and a solace from the mid-day heat, and the vine which, long years after, he guarded and trained, rewards him yearly with its ripened treasures of fruit.

Nature has few inactive seasons; but one winter for a whole series of blossoming, fruitage and harvest. What then of that most wonderful of all the creations of God? Are his periods of growth from infancy and on through adolescence to old age the ultimatum? or do they comprehend the whole glory and majesty of humanity? Verily we believe not.

There is a germ of infinite possibilities in each mortal tenement, which may grow and develop into an angel, or dwarf and become debased into the opposite; a germ which may grow into a creation of beauty and healing, or sink into a dependency and a curse.

As that soul-germ is tended, protected and nurtured, so will be its growth; till, taking on the conditions of maturity, these words of Jesus speak with power to its consciousness—"I will that ye bear much fruit."

But what is the fruit that such as are called of God can bear? The same as the natural man, whose enjoyments and pursuits are all "of the earth, earthly?" The same as the natural instincts of man, unilluminated by the self-denying gospel of Christ bring forth, in those who live in the element of worldliness? Most truly we believe not.

A wiser than the generality of mankind has said that the offspring of the spiritually called, are the holy and elevated thoughts, words and deeds which they produce, transmit, and which bless the world with their elevating tendencies.

Jesus said, "those who are accounted worthy to attain the spiritual condition live as the angels" (here on earth). How, then, do the angels live? He has told us how they do not live, when he said: "They neither marry nor are given in marriage." Is it mine and thine with them? or have they gained that blissful height for which Jesus and his disciples toiled when on earth? the oneness in love, which came from each loving his neighbor as himself and providing and caring for no selfish love nor interest?

Curb the tide of natural impulse and desires, and the current, instead of producing natural fruit or limitless waste, will in time yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness. This is the fruit that will yield, instead of uncertainty, blight and mildew, positive results of goodness, and all the Christian graces. The fruit may be slower in developing than that of any natural crop; but, Oh! so sure; for is it not said "The sower to the flesh shall of that reap corruption, but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting?" The results will be a progressive elevation into every thing that is just and pure and lovely in the one case, while the slave of his passions will be sinking lower and lower in subjection to them, until "the evil days will come when he will have no pleasure," and no earthly offspring, or riches, or honor, will be able to cheer the soul entering on the untried spirit condition, for which the other has become so well fitted.

The fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, etc., and though the cross which Jesus bore, arouses in us conditions opposed to those graces, and feels at times heavy, and the yoke burdensome, still will come the time, when the blest fruition will be obtained and the victory complete.

The battle must be fought by each one for him or herself; in one sense single-banded and alone, each soul to its maker; and in another, as in the company of the just and redeemed of all ages; an innumerable company of the just made perfect. A sympathy which is not of God only weakens and enervates the struggling soul which needs the tonic, bracing air of truth and honest dealing.

Watered by the prayers and tears of the faithful and the spirit of contrition and godly sorrow; strengthened by the rays of truth and love from the Sun of righteousness; dug about and enriched by the faithful labors of the many consecrated; toughened by the biting winds of adversity and kindly criticism, how sweetly comes echoing down the many years from the great Husbandman: "Trees of my own planting I will that ye bear much fruit." Fruits of love and consecration; the lovely fruits of peace and meekness, which will make you beautiful in the eyes of angels and the good; and which will enable you to become trees of healing and life for the sin-sick souls of earth—"Life-giving nourishment for souls an-hungered."

Those who are on the plane of the natural and earthly may perpetuate the earthly image, according to nature's laws, but who are called to a spiritual resurrection, to newness of life and obedience, die to the earthly that the spiritual may live, even as the grain is ground and its vitality destroyed, ere it becomes life-giving bread to the hungry.

"I will that ye bear much fruit;"

For the barren and leafless, we know
Give grief to the husbandman's heart.

Then hasten, in spirit to grow.
The dew and the sunlight receive,
The false and the hollow shake off;
And true to thy uses perceive—
Christ's kingdom is not afar off.

If we would grow, we must be faithful in obeying our convictions; faithful in our temporal avocations and in all the duties of life; consecrated in all our faculties to the good of the body of Christ, in all its uses and adornings; withholding no gift which has been intrusted to our care, to be used as by faithful stewards for the interest, enjoyment and edification of the church.

Forgetfulness of self, animated with pure benevolence, will make us willing servants of the spheres, in all that is elevating and refining; will make us more like him who knew no will but the will of the Infinite, and who went about doing good.

We shall learn to pass and repass each other as the angels, and would as soon harm ourselves as injure, by thought, word or deed, the feelings of another. Knowing that love and union and joy and peace are heaven, we shall not thoughtlessly mar that heaven by anything unfeeling or unkind, but shall speak and act so kindly and lovingly, that never a saddened heart or tear-filled eye shall witness against us.

In this condition of harmony and love, the angels who are sent to minister to the heirs of salvation could reach us, and by their help and influence we can be so swallowed up in heavenly joy and illumination, that the sorrows and trials of life would disappear, and fancied joys be no temptation. The sphere of love, blessing and peace would be so strong and sustaining, that "great would become the peace of Jerusalem," and lookers on would be constrained to exclaim: "Behold how these brethren do love one another!" and thus would be spread our Zion's fair fame.

The Prophet said that Saviours should appear on Mt. Zion, and to fulfill the type will there not be those who have walked humbly in the footsteps of Him who was pre-eminently a Saviour from sin? With the authority of the leader and Elder Brother in our redemption, his voice kindly yet earnestly speaks to each of us, his professed followers: "I will that ye bear much fruit."

"The true heirs of heaven are all interwoven
Like fruit bearing vines in the vineyard of God,
Their spirits are living, with beauty they're blooming,
While watered and fed by the hand of the Lord.
They love one another as sister and brother—
Uniting with angels in heavenly birth,
They are the redeemed—
The servants who're sealed—
The glory of heaven, the light of the earth."

HEAVENLY ASPIRATIONS.

—O—

HENRY MANTLE.

Heavenly treasures we are seeking,
For this earth is not our home;
From its shades we are retreating,
Hoping for the good to come.
Praised be our God in heaven,
Praised be His saints below,
With the saints above we leaven,
And their sympathy we know.

Oft our trials seem oppressive—
Hard and harsh the storms we bear—
Mercy then makes more impressive,
That of heaven we may share.
Whether high or low our station,
Let us labor to fulfill
Every righteous obligation—
Bowling to God's righteous will.

Life, we seek, life everlasting—
May our souls immortal live;
And of heavenly fruits be tasting,
Such as gold nor earth can give.
Pass away ye fading treasures—
Pass, ye vanities of time—
Let us have immortal pleasures—
Pure, substantial, and divine.

MUSIC—NO. 41.

—O—

JAS. G. RUSSELL.

Musical instruments.—A two-fold meaning is often applied to this familiar term, one of which has reference to the human voice, while the other has reference to mechanical structure, the latter of which is to become the topic for this article. Musical instruments, as mechanical means for disclosing musical tones, have been brought to almost inestimable perfection, yet nevertheless are quite foreign from the cherished claims of some, whose limited knowledge of their superior worth stands yet at very low ebb. Realizing the prominent reasons for such a woeful disdain of musical instruments, the arguments in their favor could not be otherwise than considerate and candid. To elicit points more clearly, the subject of musical instruments will be considered under four heads, to be treated upon respectively in their proper time and place.

First, their use in schools.—Every singing-teacher doubtless finds, from personal experience, various degrees of talent displayed in his pupils. Some are capable of accomplishing quite readily almost any and every point presented for their attainment, while others are much more deficient, scarcely able to discern even the ordinary intonations of the gamut, much less to perform them, without a long and tedious taxation upon the teacher, especially if there is not a ready instrument to lighten the weary work, and determine the falling away, if there is any, from the pitch or key—a fault remarkably prevalent where no instrument is used, and equally ruinous to musical effect. Even one faulty singer upon this point is liable to draw a whole choir from the key.

Second, their abuse in schools.—Instruments, as a general rule, should never become the moving power in school, but only a "backer"—an aid to the singers, enabling them to sustain the key. When singers collapse into an indifferent condition, leaving instruments to perform their share of the work for them, they cease to be the mere aids for which they were intended; hence their use becomes abuse.

Third, their use in church.—As preliminary to this point, it may be asserted that, were the mere harmony and beauty of music the only point for consideration, it might with propriety be claimed that congregational singing should be wholly excluded from church. But the writer, with no disrespect to the God-given laws of harmony, takes the position that in the worship of God the greatest good to souls should be paramount to all other considerations; hence, to restrain or debar from musical praises, because talents are not par excellence, any who should feel moved to join in the song, would be an encroachment upon the devotional feelings of the worshipper that no systematized course of music culture should ever be allowed to justify. (But more of this in our next number.) Musical instruments, wherever used in church, should subserve the two-fold purpose of aids to the singers in sustaining the key, and helps, to swell the strains of music to far greater power and perfection than voices alone would be capable of doing.

Fourth, their abuse in church.—Similar, and quite equal to faults shown up in school abuses, may be discernable by those in church, and quite as difficult to remove, attributable not altogether to the use of instruments, but in some measure, at least, to a lack of true devotional feelings, as the writer fails to recognize a single instance of a singer's exhibiting a marked degree of apathy when singing with instruments, that showed less sign of the same malady when singing without them. If the use, then, of instruments serves to warrant such lamentable departure from religious devotion, the fault should be attributed to right causes, that instruments which in themselves are designed to be not only harmless, but of great worth to devoted singers, be not made the objects of bitter, condemnatory imprecations, when the real fault is with the singers, some of whom, through their passive, disinterested and irreligious condition of mind, would render the use of instruments a positive abuse.

INTERESTING CALCULATION.

—O—

The following from the Christian Observer is commended to the reader who chews tobacco:

Allow that a young man, who is a confirmed tobacco chewer, may live twenty-five years. In each day there will issue from his mouth half a pint of fluid too nauseously disgusting to describe. In twenty-five years this will amount to five hundred and fifty gallons or more than four hogsheds of this detestable mess. In the same time, allowing him only two ounces a day, he will roll, as a sweet morsel under his tongue, half a ton of the hateful weed, which will sicken a dog or kill a horse, forming a heap the size of a haystack. Then his rejected quids would form a still larger pile. Now if such a young man could see ten half hogsheds full of abominable filth, destined to pass through his mouth, a wagon load of tobacco and ten wheelbarrows heaped up with quids, designed for an equally intimate association with his lips, how would the prospect affect him?

CORRESPONDENCE.

—o—
HYDE PARK, MASS., Sept. 19, 1876.

MR. F. W. EVANS—Dear sir: Two years ago, while in the cars, travelling in New Hampshire, I bought several small books of a Shakeress. They were explanatory of certain things, but I did not get the particular information I was seeking.

When entirely convenient for you, I would be pleased to receive answer to the following questions:

1st. Did Ann Lee profess to be inspired by the Spirit of the Living God like the Prophets, whose writings are received in the bible? 2d. Did she profess to be the woman foretold in the twelfth chapter of Revelations? 3d. Did she ever say she was authorized, or permitted, by the Lord, to claim the promise made in the beginning—that her seed should bruise the serpent's head? 4th. Do the writings of Ann Lee, or any other Shaker or Shakeress, resemble, in any respect, those of Joanna Southcott, of England? As you may be aware, Mrs. Southcott published many books, claiming the above.

Yours truly,

GEO. L. RICHARDSON.

MOUNT LEBANON, Oct. 10, 1876.

GEO. L. RICHARDSON—Respected friend: In answer to the questions in your letter, I inclose a little tract that will help you about Prophets.

A Prophet is a Man, or Woman, inspired by the Christ Spirit—not Jesus—from the Christ sphere.

Ann Lee was a Prophetess, and more than a Prophetess. She was the Character of whom the Prophets wrote in the forty-fifth Psalm and other portions of sacred writ.

She was not the Woman named in the twelfth chapter of Revelations. That was the Holy Mother Spirit in Deity.

In the twelfth verse we have the Church, after being in the wilderness 42 months—1,260 days—when Ann Lee becomes the Church symbolized, or personified. Her history exactly corresponds with the Revelations. The Church and State Governments persecuted her. She fled, on Eagle's Wings—the American Ensign—to the wilderness of America. The “flood” of lies and slanders came. The Earth—Infernal Government of America—helped Ann Lee by swallowing the flood—separating Church and State. Her seed bruised Lust—the Head sin of man's sensual nature.

Joanna Southcott I know all about—have her books. She came up under the same elements that Ann Lee did.

When Jesus came up, some thirty Jesuses came up too.

The elements that produced Napoleon or Washington would have produced thirty, if one after another had failed.

The wellbeing of the race does not depend upon One person. Had Ann Lee failed, another would have been raised up in her place.

Christ is distinct from any human being. It is the baptizing spirit of the New Creation.

Shakerism is pure, primitive Christianity. It is like a “city set upon a hill that cannot be hid.”

Community of Goods, Celibacy, Peace, Plainness in dress and speech, Yea and Nay, are distinguishing marks, not easily mistaken or counterfeited.

Respectfully

F. W. EVANS.

A GREAT TRUTH.

J. HACKER.

MAN is of the earth, earthly. All things earthly are subject to corrosion and rust. Weeping, like acid poured into a rusty machine, softens and loosens the rust, and laughing, like pure water, washes out the rust. Hence, the wise man said there is a time to weep and a time to laugh. Hence, weeping and laughing should be indulged in, in the proper times.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

DECLINE OF SPIRITUALISM.

—o—

THERE is nothing strange, to us, in the fact admitted by leading Spiritualists, “that a partial eclipse has gradually crept over the heaven illumined face of Spiritualism.” Having been led out from worse than Egyptian bondage—theological enthrallment—to the banks of a New Jerusalem, where progress might be eternal without impediment, they have chosen to “tarry by the shore,” and ply thus long with the waves and instruments of their liberation, taking no other advantages of their liberation from the house of captivity.

The very simple illustration of the return of “one from the dead” has been, and is verily sufficient to make Babylon of all the pet schemes and man-made creeds of the ages. Though seventy-five per cent of the manifestations claiming to be spiritual phenomena were only frauds, what of it? If twenty-five in one hundred are true, and even much less than these, what will become of the theological pets, physical resurrection, vicarious atonement, election and reprobation, heaven, hell and the devil? The emancipation from these errors has been experienced, more or less, by spiritualists for twenty-five years; and millions are the converts from such bondage. The Shaker Church was thus enlightened one hundred years ago; and a continued, unbroken manifestation of communication between the two worlds has ever since been its boast. Had it remained stationary, dallying with the manifold physical phenomena common to it, and which have become so positively disgusting in modern spiritualism, where, spiritually speaking, would said Church long since have been? Eclipsed; blotted out; forgotten. And whatever of eclipse the Shaker Church has experienced, we frankly confess, it has been caused by our failure to progress; by our “tarrying by the way”—striving to be satisfied with past phenomena, moonshine—reflected light—rather than pressing forward to the vivifying brilliance and warmth of the sunlit revelations of to-day.

Inasmuch as we have progressed from the merely phenomenal to progressive spiritual duty, spiritualism has not only relieved us of dead and deadening theologies, but it has given us new and living convictions. These convictions have led us away from our old lives, even as far as they have removed us from old theologies. They have taught us that the generative, reproductive, earthly principle is not spiritual, however righteous as an earthly elementary, and we have left it for something more progressive. What have Spiritualists done? Spiritualism has instructed us that Communism is more, very much more, spiritual than the narrow circle of the conjugal relation; hence, to be much more spiritual we have embraced COMMUNISM. Spiritualists, do you see that we move? “In heaven above, where all is love,” there is no such narrowness as is exhibited in private families; why should there be in our heaven below? Spiritualism has taken, or is taking away the elements that would make us quarrel and fight for the constituents of the old life; does it work so with you, eclipsed brethren and sisters? God grant that it may! Spiritualism teaches us that progress means, “from the world, from the flesh, far away”; have Spiritualists arrived there yet? And so we might continue. We would lash, with whips of large-corded criticism, the converts to Spiritualism for their luxury in accepting the terms of spiritual progress, and accept their lashing criticism, inasmuch as they have transcended us. We hope, and believe a little, in the efficiency of the “New Movement.” But unless it shall cause their “righteousness to exceed the righteousness” of their surroundings, and their former, fleshly lives, we will continue in the opinion that they not only accept the eclipse, but desire the old flesh-pots of Egypt, rather than any advance that costs so much self-denial to be genuine Spiritualists. We had greater hopes of “Spiritualists” than we have realized. Why? ☆

BROTHERHOOD.

—o—

ONE of the transcendent qualities, and best evidences of Christianity, is the manifestation of brotherly love, like unto Jesus' and apostolic times. Perhaps there is no quality more wanting among professed christians, to make them genuine holders of the title, than an equitable distribution of all their wealth, possessions, time, talents, accumulations. It is apparent to every one that such a distribution is simply an impossibility outside of radical Christianity, and other christianity is very weak salvation. The natural, unchristian practitioner must have wife or husband; consequently, children should be born; shelter, food, education, etc., are the necessities following. It is not in human nature, unbaptized by the Christ, to care as well for a neighbor's as for its own. The laws of the Jews recognized and condemned this very selfish principle; hence, set apart Sabbaths, whereon equal distribution of accumulations and power was again and again enforced—even the land, the foundation of all earthly wealth, was returned to its original owners at intervals of at least half a life time.

But the giving-up-all principle, either for God or humanity, is more foreign to the myriads of professional Christians than to any persuasion which they dub heathen. If a man gives up his wife to the Lord, or a woman does the same with her husband, it is with especial understanding that the Lord will permit the continuance of all the selfish, unchristlike behavior of the past. The same of their children, houses, lands, and all personal possessions. Are these not facts?

When Jesus gave up his wife, or her who would have been such to him, he renounced even the further intention of engaging in marital relationship. With its renunciation his life was cut off from the earthly; and “who shall declare his generations?” Where are his descendants? All men and women became his brethren, who, after his pattern, did the examples he set them. All of his wealth was theirs; all the children conceived and born prior to the Christian conversion of their parents were equally his. The apostles “left their nets and followed” his examples; and thus a little community was inaugurated where “none possessed ought that he called his own.” Thus, Christian purity was not merely construed to be virginity of life, but was such in very deed — is as really such to-day. The practice of virginity opened the way for the equally necessary, if not superior distinction of life, COMMON PROPERTY. Professedly Christian friends, "let us reason together," realize the impropriety of bearing a title so commonly misrepresented in our lives. Let us renounce the title, or accustom ourselves to what it was in Jesus and disciples. The renunciation of the name Christian is not nearly as terrible as is the shame of wearing a title that is disgraced by unchristian lives. Let us accept the criticism, that only as our lives comport with Jesus' principles of life, are we his disciples, or worthy to bear the Christian title. Then will shame rest on nearly every church in our world, professing Christ; aye, every church will want to hide its head with more or less shame. Selfishness predominates almost universally, while the wealthy in power, in talents, in money, secretly, if not openly, oppress and defraud their neighbors! Why are there rich and poor in any church calling itself Christian? Inasmuch as there exists inequalities there is no Christ; no matter where the profession is made, nor who makes it. The voice of THE CHRIST sounds as full of rebuke against selfishness, and in favor of "brotherly love, to-day as ever, and do we will to hear it? And the voice sounds significantly distinct to those making the greater boasts of their profession. Let us all awake to greater righteousness in Christian equality; until before God in our secret lives, and before men in our open professions, the name and the life are synonyms of Christianity. And let the churches shame themselves for their lack, and do better. And let the "peculiar people," who, having taken the initiative step in Christ-life—a thoroughly virgin practice—"deal justly, walk humbly," in the most unselfish and equal manner; being "zealous in the good works" comprehended by and defining BROTHERHOOD. ☆

ANY IDOLS FOR SALE?

THE Christian Register says:

The Christian Recorder (Philadelphia), organ of the African Methodists, advises the pastors of poor churches, pressed by debt, not to go out begging. "The better plan by far would be to rally your own people, and get them to give to God the money they spend for naught, in the shape of tobacco, etc." Most of the "white folksey" will be quite prompt to applaud this advice; but will it occur to them that the same principle applies all round? When the Unitarians, for instance, shall care enough for their own religious privileges and principles to practice some self-denial, and retrench some useless expenses for the sake of getting and doing higher good, there will be a great deal less begging by the weak churches, and a good deal more given by the strong ones.

So say we of New Churchmen, or of any kind of churchmen. We should like to take the contract of running the church, Holy Catholic and otherwise, of all the names and kinds, for the sum which it costs our nation for tobacco. We would agree to build all the churches, pay all the ministers, defray all the incidental expenses, double the amount of contributions to all missions and benevolent objects, and support all the theological seminaries. If we could get such a contract for ten years we should be the richest men in America, if not in world. If men, good men, Christian men, would make as large sacrifices to the Lord as they do for satan, there would be no lack of means to do any work which is given to the Church to do.

New Jerusalem Messenger.

Come now, good, strong Shakers, let us all join in and say and act "Amen!" to such active, judicious, and Godly conversion of means. When the period comes that we cannot, then we will wish we had done just so; now that we can, let it not be said that we love any habit better than we do the Lord, or those to whom we ought to be the means of conversion unto all Godliness. How much true gospel would our useless, unchristian habits spread if these should be sold? See if the grumblers of THE SHAKER'S tax, or the same for any evangelical work, are not those who are deeply interested in some selfish, worldly habit. "Sell all" (useless, ungodly habits), "and buy" for ourselves and others true gospel principles and the power of salvation. ☆

BEST USES OF MONEY.

—o—
This greed for riches sets every man in business against his fellow. It piles up riches with the few at the expense of the many. It assumes a thousand forms of benevolence. It assures much upon the receipt of little, beginning in deceit, and generally ending in fraud and disappointment. * * *

Men, for popularity's sake, give their money to old church institutions that have no need of it, and receive curses instead of blessings as a reward. Men are asked to aid the Church, or to increase their annual pittance, and plead poverty, and hard times, and dull business, but enter into some wild scheme to add to their already large accumulations, and within a week, or a month, or a year, the fire, or the thief, or fraud, or business reverses takes away ten times the amount they were asked to contribute to the Church.

There is a large truth in the above sentence of the N. J. Messenger, and worthy of heed by many readers of THE SHAKER. A few years hence and time and money will be among the things of the past. The highest and best uses of money and talents will then appear the very reverse of what we fear, even some of the most economical trustees hold them to be now. The main body and heart of the people, called Shakers, are liberal, patriotic, anxious, and confident that truth will prevail. And the heart of the people beats in unison with God. May there be no selfish impediments in the way of spreading true Shaker principles, for they are "the salt of the earth." ☆

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—o—
"THE New Movement," by Spiritualists, is gaining approbation where it has heretofore been ridiculed. We hailed the same as desirable; yet wherein does a spiritualist differ from the multitudes, excepting theologically? And where is the theology, which, of itself, would keep a church mouse from starving? Spiritual (?) friends, "except your righteousness of life exceed" the lives of your brethren, orthodox, (?) your secession and "new movements" are useless addenda. Nū nisi cruce, will meet your real needs.

CAN we not raise sufficient enthusiasm for the CAUSE OF THE SHAKER, to double our DECEMBER issue? Five cents each, from our thousands of readers, would treble, and circulate the usual edition! How many are anxious, and willing to preach the gospel in this way—silently, saliently and successfully? The missionary box is now open. Who bids most?

BELIEVING in our principles—living under their excellent conditions—enjoying the good fruits of the gospel very measurably, we are anxious everybody should know of them, and, according as they can afford, test them. We believe the true spirit of inquiry is on its travels; and where sufficient zeal is aroused anywhere, to demand an oral exposition of Shaker principles, such inquirers may unhesitatingly address our valued "CORRESPONDING AGENTS," or this office, for the desired assistance. "A half a loaf is better than no bread;" and some self-denial is far better salt—salvation—than despairing, unlimited indulgences.

A GOOD Shaker in every household would be a living, active reminder to the people of how Jesus lived when on earth. If this cannot be, the next best movement is to place a copy of THE SHAKER there. "LET EVERY ONE PREACH"—and they can in this way. If we were a millionaire, two millions of households should harbor a copy of THE SHAKER during 1877; and we promise to send a copy somewhere, whenever its cost is received by us. "Millions for tribute!" Who will interest themselves?

THE Christ life is the true Resurrection. Who would be "Children of the Resurrection?"—"I am the Resurrection," said Christ—may and can begin that resurrection in this life, with a great deal of spiritual advancement and future gain. The fact that "the children of the resurrection neither marry," etc., is not an argument against marriage, so much as it is an invitation to be something higher, better, purer, more spiritual and resurrected than "the children of the world."

THOSE who are "miserable sinners" have no right to the title of Christians, be they who they may. Christians are those who, naming themselves after Christ, have departed from all iniquity. If Christ associated with publicans and sinners, it was to reform them so they could justly wear his title; and when they would not part from their sins, he tarried with them no longer.

FROM the many exceptions which the clergy of this country take to Prof. Huxley's theories, we presume there must be much true theology in his ideas of science. We have learned that Doctors of Divinity, (?) Theological Students, and Theological Seminaries dislike nothing more than scientific truth, as illustrated in the life of Jesus, the Christ, or the same, revealed to those who are infidels to the means used, to the end that men may interpret what scripture does not mean. And thus millions of dollars are worse than wasted on such institutions and men.

BOOK TABLE.

—o—
If any one doubts Canadian enterprise, let him secure a copy of The Family Herald and Weekly Star, Montreal, Canada, the subscription of which is only $1.25, post-paid. We used to think the Weekly Tribune New York, enterprising, but it is not equal for "common humanity's" use to the Weekly Star. Send for a copy.

The Country Gentleman, Albany, N. Y., keeps ahead of any Agricultural, Horticultural or Stock publication in the world. All the premiums which others offer, it uses in improving its usefulness; and this is premium enough. It is a most valuable paper for farmers, gardeners, etc.

DR. E. M. WADE, of Watervliet Centre, N. Y., recommends, rather than deprecates, the extensive adulteration of coffee with chicory (cichorium intybus). Those who have been conscience stricken by the fraud, may be relieved, and realize that the root is more valuable to the human family than the berry which they have attempted to counterfeit.

SOCIETY RECORD.

NORTH UNION, OHIO. Anticipated development of stone quarry at this place looks like a steady source of income to Society.

Grist mill, built in 1844, has failed for years to be more than a convenience, and sometimes only an expense, is now running by steam, and likely to be appreciated as one of the best in the country.

Nearly 1,000 bushels of oats threshed. Early potatoes were a good crop; late ones not so good—bugs, etc.

Roots and garden products coming in well. This Society has 1,350 acres of land. A dairy herd at the centre family—forty cows—are unequalled in the State. For reasons, see cover, of what Ohio Farmer says.

WATERVLIET, N. Y. This Society closed its public services on October 1. On Sunday, September 24, Geo. B. Amery, of WHITE WATER VILLAGE, Ohio, delivered, by invitation, a stirring address to the people. We were sorry that the usual thousand of auditors was not there.

MT. LEBANON, N. Y. Much has been said of Shaker speaking and singing at the Salt Point, N. Y., Peace meeting, and there is no doubt much good was done by the attendance and efforts of Ehler F. W. Evans & Co. The music, "Pray, open the gates," being a New Hampshire production, and highly complimented, we may as well consider that ENFIELD had a representative spirit there. While Philadelphia was a failure, Salt Point was a grand success! Why? Worldly ambition was entirely obliterated in one of these places!

Any Societies, dedicated to human improvement, will do well to urge Mt. Lebanon to participate.

ENFIELD, CONN. sent a company of relations to Mt. Lebanon and Watervliet, during September, on a visit. This is the only company of our visitors that has met with us during the year, and it numbered some very beautiful souls. One of these loved THE SHAKER so well that she invariably "reads every word in it, advertisements on cover and all!" Some of THE SHAKER'S best friends are at Enfield, Conn.

WHITE WATER VILLAGE, OHIO This Society is making a determined push to introduce their seeds and other products into eastern markets, and to keep as shy of middle men as possible—as grangers! Who can blame them?

CANTERBURY, N. H. (Shaker Village P. O.), beats the entire world in WASHING MACHINES. While we knew they were very good, we are joyful that they are ne plus ultra in their line. We will welcome better, but advise all in need of laundry apparatus to address N. A. Briggs, as above.

GROVELAND, N. Y. (Sonyea, P. O.), has been blest in basket and in store, and we hope they will have storage room to pack their crops, and health and help to secure all. The people are worthy, and needy of much kindly sympathy in lifting a heavy load, unearned by present residents. God helps them. Let the opulent imitate God.

PHILADELPHIA, PENN. This Society has been the recipient of very numerous visits from many other Societies—Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, and yet continues to live.

SPIRIT OF THE FARM.

THE FARM IMPLEMENTS.—Now that the crops are laid by, what about the farm implements? We are not going to worry over them—why should we? The editor of this paper has plenty of friends who make or sell agricultural implements, and why should he continue to run against their interests, as he has long been doing, by urging the farmers to take care of their tools? These people must all live, that is if they are not "middlemen," you know; and if a neighboring religious editor tells the truth the signs of the times now promise very well for their getting along—the implement makers and dealers, you understand. That editor says he saw in a ride of ninety miles which he took through an average agricultural district the following unhoused implements, namely: Forty-four ploughs, twenty-three harrows, seven mowers, one reaper with beater and platforms as last used, wagons too numerous to count, and in one instance a set of harness hanging on a fence. The ploughs were mostly standing in the furrow where they had been last used. Such a sight as that gladdening the heart of the itinerant manufacturer, and is an example which ought to be followed by every tiller of the soil who wants a new set of implements.

And now, dear farmers, such of you as are tired of the old tools, let us give you a bit of advice. If you don't take it any better than advice we have given you on former occasions, all right. It will be no great loss to us; so here it is: Do not rub linseed oil on your fork and shovel and rake handles; do not paint your ploughs and mowers; do not use any rust preventive on the iron and steel parts, and above all, leave every thing out of doors. You really have no idea how quickly you will possess a new set of tools, provided you have a balance at the bank. Only seven mowers and one reaper out in the air in a stretch of ninety miles! And only one set of harness! Well, we will hope for a better report from that section the next time our contemporary goes that way.

TREATMENT OF AN UNMANAGEABLE HORSE.

A beautiful and high-spirited horse would never allow a shoe to be put on his feet, or any person to handle his feet. In an attempt to shoe such a horse recently, he resisted all efforts, kicked aside everything but an anvil, and came nearly killing himself against that, and finally was brought back to the stable unshod. This defect was just on the eve of consigning him to the plough, where he might work barefoot, when an officer in our service, lately returned from Mexico, took a cord, about the size of a common bed-cord, put it in the mouth of the horse like a bit, and tied it tightly on the animal's head, passing his left ear under the string, not painfully tight, but tight enough to keep the ear down and the cord in its place. This done, he patted the horse gently on the side of the head and commanded him to follow; and instantly the horse obeyed, perfectly subdued and as gentle and obedient as a well-trained dog, suffering his feet to be lifted with impunity, acting in all respects like an old stager. The gentleman who thus furnished this exceedingly simple means of subduing a very dangerous propensity, intimated that it is practiced in Mexico and South America in the management of wild horses.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Ibid.

"LATIN and Greek are all right," said a Delaware farmer, but give me a man who can plow round an apple tree without touching the roots."

THE following, from The Prairie Farmer, is worthy of a place among the writings of Franklin. The sayings of "Poor Richard," who "paid too much for his whistle," are equaled by the writer of—

THE BOY WHO HAD A PATCH ON BOTH KNEES, AND GLOVES ON.

WHEN I was a boy it was my fortune to breathe, for a long time, what some writers call the "bracing air of poverty." My mother—light lie the turf upon the gentle form which once enclosed her strong and gentle spirit—was what is commonly called an ambitious woman; for that quality which overturns thrones and supplants dynasties, finds a legitimate sphere in the humblest abode that the shadow of poverty ever darkened. The struggle between the wish to keep up appearances, and the plucking gudge of necessity, produced endless shifts and contrivances at which, were they told, some would smile, and some to whom they would recall their own experiences, would sigh. But let me not disturb that veil of oblivion which shrouds from profane eyes the hallowed mysteries of poverty.

On one occasion it was necessary to send me upon an errand to a neighbor in better circumstances than ourselves, and to whom it was necessary that I should be presented in the best possible aspect. Great pains were accordingly taken to give a smart appearance to my patched and dilapidated wardrobe, and to conceal the rents and chasms which the envious tooth of time had made in them, and by way of throwing over my equipment a certain savor and sprinkling of gentility, my red and toil-hardened hands were inclosed in the unfamiliar casing of a pair of gloves, which had belonged to my mother in days when her years were fewer and her heart lighter.

I sallied forth on my errand, and on my way encountered a much older and bigger boy, who evidently belonged to a family which had all their own dragging poverty, and none of our uprising wealth of spirit. His rags fairly fluttered in the breeze; his hat was constructed on the most approved principle of ventilation, and his shoes, from their venerable antiquity, might have been deemed a pair of fossil shoes—the very ones in which Shem shuffled into the ark. He was an impudent varlet, with a dare-devil swagger in his gait, an "I'm as good as you" leer in his eye—the very whelp to throw a stone at a well-dressed horseman because he was well-dressed; to tear a boy's ruffles because he was clean. As soon as he saw me, his eyes detected the practical inconsistencies which characterized my costume, and taking me by the shoulders, turning me round with no gentle hand and surveying me from head to foot, he exclaimed, with a scornful laugh of derision, "A patch on both knees, and gloves on!"

I still recall the sting of wounded feeling which shot through me at these words. To parody a celebrated line of the immortal Tuscan—

"That day I wore my gloves no more."

But the lesson thus rudely enforced, sank deep into my mind, and, in after life, I have had frequent occasion to make a practical application of the words of my ragged friend, when I have observed the practical inconsistencies which so often mark the conduct of mankind.

When, for instance, I see parents carefully providing for the ornamental education of their children, furnishing them with teachers in music, dancing and drawing, but giving no thought to that moral and religious training from which the true dignity and permanent happiness of life alone can come; never teaching them habits of self-sacrifice, and self-discipline, and control, but rather by example instructing them in evil speaking; in uncharitableness; in envy, and in falsehood, I think with a sigh of the patch on both knees, and gloves on.

When I see a family in a cold, selfish solitude, not habitually warming their house with the glow of happy faces, but lavishing that which should furnish the hospitality of a whole year upon the profusion of a single night, I think of the patch on both knees, and gloves on.

When I see a house profusely furnished with sumptuous furniture, rich curtains, and luxurious carpets, but with no books, or none but a few tawdry annuals, I am reminded of the patch on both knees, and gloves on.

When I see the public men cultivating exclusively those qualities which win a way to office, and neglecting those which qualify them to fill honorably the posts to which they aspire, I recall the patch on both knees and gloves on.

When I see men sacrificing peace of mind and health of body to the insane pursuit of wealth, living in ignorance of the character of their children who are growing up around them, cutting themselves off from the highest and purest pleasures of their natures, and so preventing their humanity that that which was sought as a means insensibly comes to be followed as an end, I say to myself, a patch on both knees, and gloves on.

When I see thousands squandered for selfishness and ostentation, and nothing bestowed for charity; when I see fine ladies bestained and bejeweled, cheapening the toils of dressmakers, and with harsh words embittering the bitter bread of dependence; when I see the poor turned away from proud houses, where the crumbs of tables would be to them a feast, I think of the patch on both knees, with gloves on.

BEAUTIFUL THINGS.

—o—
Beautiful faces are those that wear—
It matters little if dark or fair—
Whole-souled honesty printed there.

Beautiful eyes are those that show,
Like crystal panes where hearth-fires glow,
Beautiful thoughts that burn below.

Beautiful lips are those whose words
Leap from the heart like songs of birds,
Yet whose utterance prudence girds.

Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest and brave and true,
Moment by moment the long day through.

Beautiful feet are those that go
On kindly ministries to and fro—
Down lowliest ways, if God wills it so.

Beautiful shoulders are those that bear
Ceaseless burdens of homely care
With patient grace and daily prayer.

Beautiful lives are those that bless—
Silent rivers of happiness,
Whose hidden fountains but few may guess.

Beautiful twilight, at set of sun,
Beautiful goal, with race well won,
Beautiful rest, with work well done.

Beautiful graves, where grasses creep,
Where brown leaves fall, where drifts lie deep,
Over worn out hands — Oh, beautiful sleep!

ELLEN P. ALLERTON.

THE superstitious see horrid spectres and hideous phantoms in their sleep; their bewildered imagination creates tortures by which they are crushed and torn; they fancy they hear commands as dreadful as they are whimsical, and which they are constrained to obey. A superstitious person dreads his fancied God, and yet fancies that he finds refuge in his bosom. The fears derived from superstition are more causeless and stupid than those derived from any other source.

A SENSIBLE NOTICE.

—o—
LE DERBY, a French Journal, gives the following as a printed notice which the Minister of Agriculture has caused to be posted in all the crossways of the forestal domains:

MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE.

This placard is placed under the protection of good sense and public decency.

HEDGEHOG.

Lives on mice, small rodents, slugs and grubs (vers blancs), animals hurtful to agriculture.

Don't kill the hedgehog.

TOAD.

Farm assistant: destroys from twenty to thirty insects an hour.

Don't kill the toad.

MOLE.

Is continually destroying grubs (vers blancs), larvæ, palmer worms, and insects injurious to agriculture. No trace of vegetation is ever found in its stomach. Does more good than harm.

Don't kill the mole.

MAY BUG AND ITS LARVA OR GRUB.

Mortal enemy of agriculture; lays from seventy to eighty eggs.

Kill the May bug.

BIRDS.

Each department loses several millions annually through insects. Birds are the only enemies able to contend against them victoriously. They are great caterpillar killers and agricultural assistants.

Children, don't disturb their nests.

NORTH UNION, O. High credit is given of Elder G. B. Avery's public address at this place on Aug. 13. The assemblies on Sunday have very materially increased numerically since.

The Shakers met with the "Men of the Forests," on 30th August, in Burgess Grove; did several handsome sentiments and sung some delightful songs among others "Glorious Day."

MUTUAL CRITICISM: We incline to a dread of criticism upon our conduct, either from a knowledge of our defects or from a suspicion of others' injustice. That the inclination is, to say the least, an ignoble one, no noble-minded person will dispute. Wherever there is the power of persons or organizations to bear mutual criticism, holding strictly to the rule of "neither giving nor taking offense," an exceeding greatness of blessing must derive. Let organizations try it on such principle. Let families try it. Whoever keeps in good temper most strictly is the better Christian; and who does not "will learn something to his advantage." The above is a work of interest, published by American Socialist, Wallingford, Conn. Price 25 cents.

EVERGREEN SHORES.

—o—
NOTICE is given, with some very affectionate comments indeed, of some of the dear, departed aged. Among the very bright stars that have set in this world, to rise on the "evergreen shores" of "the better land," few have surpassed in virtue and value, some we mention in this issue. To say that we love them—their life and Christ-like demeanor—but faintly impresses the general reader. Did we not, as gospel relation—having no blood-ties to speak of—have such immovable faith in fact of their removal to brighter, happier spheres, we should very much mourn their departure. Our farewells are kind, yet they are realized by the pure in heart beyond our expression.

SELF-RULE.

JULIA O'CONNELL.

"He that hath no rule over his own spirit, is like a city that is broken down, and without walls."

THIS sentence is presented as an inward monitor and an external mirror. Often has its truth flashed before me in private thoughts. If we will suppose every thought of our lives planted and grown to fruitage, how many of us would be willing to gather such a harvest, or even be willing to stand afar off and gaze on the distortion? Yet, when we distrust the peace of others by giving rein to an envious, jealous or fault-finding spirit, how surely are we growing unto a harvest, what we even refuse to look at as a reward! "The walls of the city broken," our self-respect wanting; the love that is of God dying within our souls, having measured unto us in return, what we have meted out to others. But there are other means of failing to "rule our spirits" than by the planting of briars and thistles in the hearts of others. May we not indulge in melancholy and moroseness until our spiritual sun is darkened? Our friends turn foes and our whole lives revolve in gloom. Is there not a possibility of losing control of our own spirits, by such an over-anxiety for others, that, in imagination their existence and presence seems to be the axis of our own lives? Being willing even to dwell in the shade, rather than hide the sun unto them? Sacrificing, beneath this very partial influence, not only deserved pleasures, intellectual rights, but dwarfing besides, the growth of the spirit and preventing its approach unto God? Aggression from unholy impulses; consecration to a narrow, unchristian partiality; these break the walls of our city. Who said that having rule over the spirit was greater than taking a city, had a correct understanding of human nature and its inclinations—knew so well the seductions of perversion; how willing the flesh and weak the spirit; how little by little the walls of the city may be broken, until the valley of desolation is wofully reached.

DOES GOD WANT HIS NAME IN THE CONSTITUTION?

CECELIA DEVYR.

WHILE a clergyman, or even a Christian has a quid of tobacco in his mouth? Does He want His name put into the Constitution, while the government receives a large revenue from the traffic of the lower regions—the liquor trade? Does He want His name voted into the Constitution by hands that could neither cast the first nor the last stone at that gigantic, black sin which is mildly called the "social evil"? Does He want His name put into the Constitution by any who go through the miserable sham of sanctifying a system of marriage, whose soul-grinding and body-destroying slavery, the broken constitutions and early graves of American women so directly testify against? Does He want doctors, who poison constitutions with drugs, to put His name into a paper document? Does He want lawyers, who "devour widows' substance," who only administer full justice to their own pockets, and for a pretense, make profession of Him, to negotiate His name into the Constitution? Does He want any Judas Iscariot, of high or low degree, who sells republicanism here, and the hope of the down-trodden abroad, for pieces of precious metal, or for United States' bonds, to put His name into the Constitution? A society that, through monopoly, crushes some of His weak children down to wretchedness, and drives the rest along the road of crime, where the jail and the hangman's rope are liberally provided; that takes the sword and forgets to love mercy, and remembers not the injunction to depart from iniquity upon naming the Holy Name—a society that practically denies the power of God and the principles of Christ, need not blaspheme these names by putting them into the Constitution.

We sometimes read of confidence men; but the most astounding and unblushing confidence men, are those engaged in this present Church and State scheme. It is melancholy to contemplate at this time, when there is work to be done, that faithful, earnest laborers are being called away to help these designers to overthrow the good which has been effected during the century—that priestcraft is once more coiling itself around the life of a nation, and if it is not shaken off, history will repeat itself. There is but one way in which the name of God can be safely put into the Constitution: Let there be an amendment that in GOD'S NAME, the name of God and Christ will be forever kept out of that INSTRUMENT.

Let those who would honor God, be peace-makers; and they shall be called the children of God; and if they would be disciples of Christ, by this will all men know them; if they have love one for another; and if they would be high priests unto God and humanity, let them not only preach the gospel to the poor, but so preach the gospel that there shall be no poor; "for the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof;" and all who dwell thereon are "Heirs at Law to their Father's Estate." "For all ye are brethren." It is mockery to put God's name into the Constitution while His children are thus robbed.

VISIONARY DREAM

OR INTERVIEW WITH THE SPIRIT OF BROTHER DANIEL MOSELEY, ON THE NIGHT OF AUG. 12, 1876.

He seemed to have a chart of his whole earth-life, each point of particular significance was marked. He said, "when I came into conscious being in the rudimental sphere of existence, unlike the majority of youth and children of the present age, I was shielded from many temptations to which they are exposed, and was at times much exercised in mind in regard to religion, and I entered the gospel crucible, before being caught in the meshes of the grosser sins of the world; but the world proper was in me, and my deep, soul struggles were many.

When I had contested the enemies' claims and gained some point, I thought to rest a while on laurels won; but there was always a spirit near to urge me forward to engage in other battles, and win still greater victories. Thus I went from point to point in my work and travel, and after passing through many life and death struggles, and many seasons of judgment, there came to me, one great day of judgment—one general review of all the transgressions of my life, of which there had been a record kept in form of a chart. There I saw all the good and evil, the just and unjust thoughts and doings toward myself and others, a sight of which caused me both joy and sorrow." At this point, Elder Daniel Boler stepped in; "ah," said brother Daniel Moseley, "there is a man who greatly resembles his elder brother Daniel, in the work assigned him to do in the field of gospel labor, in so far as courage and unflinching determination to do, and to suffer are requisite in performance of duty, leaving fears and doubts in the wake, behind the great ship." Elder Daniel Boler smiled and said, "where are all our worthy veterans—the old sajuts who served in the army of the Lord? Whither have they gone or hid themselves? Of late I have been searching to find them?" "Well," said Brother Daniel Moseley, "for this very reason it is a wise arrangement that we pass within the vale, out of sight of mortals, that they may not stay their minds too much upon past events, nor upon their predecessors in the gospel work; but fix their minds and give their energies to present duties, and to perform the work of their own day and time."

ANTOINETTE DOOLITTLE.

THE first thing a truly religious man should seek to be is a perfect animal. Holiness, wholeness of body and perfection in bodily structure are the first triumphs a religious man can win. To be strong with all possible strength; to be beautiful with all possible beauty; to be perfect in that which is least, as a stepping-stone to perfection of that which is greater, is the first ambition of intelligent piety.—W. H. H. Murray.

MATERIALISM—SPIRITUALISM. NO. 2.

WM. H. RUSSELL.

THAT there is so great obscurity respecting the continued existence of man after his physical disorganization, is to many a sufficient reason for rejecting the idea altogether. Why, they ask, should a matter of so great importance to man be involved in so much darkness as to leave him in doubt? The answer, oft repeated, that there is no more obscurity respecting this matter than almost every thing else in the world, and that truth, though not coy, yet loves to be sought after, and oftentimes, earnestly, is not satisfactory to certain minds. The indolent mind will still ask, why the necessity of this incessant work? It is true, the materialists are not all idlers, mentally. Some are distinguished for their profound investigations in the arcana of nature; and to many of those who trust to others to do their own thinking, it is a sufficient reason why they should call themselves materialists, because these philosophers, these scientists, are such. These have searched nature through, and nowhere have discovered the fountain whose waters give immortal youth. With their hammers they have broken the primitive rock; they have searched through the secondary and tertiary formations, and lo, it is all material! They have put it into their crucibles and reduced it to its original elements, and still there is nothing but matter.

Besides, the definitions that have been given to spirit by those claiming to be teachers in all spiritual things have not tended to enlighten these matter-of-fact minds. The Infinite Being himself has been metaphysicised into something impalpable, intangible; so that the question might very properly be asked: "Canst thou, by searching, find out God?" It is not unreasonable that the scientist, if he cannot "find out the Almighty to perfection," yet should be able to lay hold of something substantial, something that shall satisfy his investigating, reasoning mind that there is a "Potency in nature," a Reality capable not only of forming the unnumbered worlds in the universe, but also of sustaining in existence forever each intelligent being found in them. Those who regard themselves as set for the defense of spiritual truth do not help such by getting angry and calling hard names. Denunciation never converted an ignorant errorist; certainly it never can convert thinking, investigating minds.

Religion, so called, has many sins to acknowledge at the confessional of truth—the greatest absurdities in doctrine, as well as the profoundest mistakes in the attempt to convert man to what is deemed the truth of God. Spiritualism, to show herself heaven-descended, must be clothed in garments of light; must be able to convince the judgment of candid, thoughtful minds, and confound the errors of unreasoning ones. She must be able to prove herself something more substantial than the gods which the old poets have invoked, or the shades which they have evoked. If not clothed with the materiality of flesh and bones, to be seen and heard, felt and handled by the corporeal senses, yet to be made manifest unmistakably to the inward consciousness as though she possessed these external attributes.

There are thousands calling themselves spiritualists who claim to have as clear and definite knowledge of certain things pertaining to another state of existence as they do of those pertaining to the earth. But there are thousands of others, of thinking, cultivated minds, who have not this knowledge, and who deny that there can be such. This being the case, it does no possible good for the former class to berate the latter as ignorant or self-conceited; nor for the latter to upbraid the former as superstitious, easily imposed upon, and willing to be duped. Candor is becoming to both sides, which both have lacked too long. The earnest spiritualist desires to impart the knowledge which seems to him of so much importance to those who have it not, and it seems to him that it should produce as powerful an effect in other minds as in his own. But the facts do not accord with the seeming. There is nothing, then, for him to do but to wait with patience for the day of triumph; to seek for new displays of truth, as well as new methods of imparting what is demonstrated truth to his own mind. Patience will work for herself a perfect work, even among the ignorant, the indifferent, the indolent, the scientist, the philosopher, as well as the fearful and despairing.

"Hope, the charmer, lingers still behind," to encourage all, and point all to the opening portal of endless life.

USES AND ABUSES OF ADVERSITY.

OLIVER PRENTISS.

To make MAN—both moieties—the first grand essential is a mother—a mother who knows her rights and maintains them.

The next essential is a father, as law-abiding, in sexual intercourse, as animals in general.

Prosperity is good—we like it. But luxury and idleness never made a man.

Adversity is just the thing we do not want—but what could we be without it? Its uses are to make us strong in self-reliance, to sanctify our powers and consecrate them to the common good.

ADVERSITY'S ABUSES.

STRONG cider, tobacco and other things to stultify—stupify the sensibilities.

Other undignified acts might be named—but we will let somebody else do that.

To presume that our audience can never know any thing only just what we tell them, is rather presuming.

Long sermons, like long newspaper articles, are behind the age.

MUSIC—NO. 12.

JAS. G. RUSSELL.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.—To clear up the subject of congregational singing, which was touched upon in the preceding number, it is here asserted that all persons, old and young, with much or little talent for singing, who expect to take part in church, should be constant attendants at singing schools and other gatherings for musical rehearsals; and furthermore, they should not only take part upon all pieces designed to be used in church, but should lay aside their own personal judgments and notions of singing, and conform strictly to the directions of a leader. This being the case, other things being equal, there is much to warrant reasonable success in congregational effect. Not that perfect development of harmony would become apparent, for this would be utterly impossible, but that sufficient results might be reached to insure safety to the true choir, and reflect no material dishonor upon music as an art. Although the objection is often raised that God requires the best at our hands and hearts, it should not be inferred that those particularly favored with the greatest music talents are the only ones to address the great and good Creator through the medium of song. Indeed, were this the case, it would be strikingly characteristic of the Calvinistic principle of election engrafted into the beautiful and divine art of music—that some were elected to sing, while others were doomed to perpetual exclusion, however desirous they might be to possess the talent. From a phrenological stand-point the writer views the illustrations of the various faculties of our mental organization, but fails to find in a single instance a neglect, on the part of the divine Architect, to insert the faculty of music. Still, the observation is made that, in certain mental organisms, such and such faculties are small, but not entirely wanting; hence there arises a chance for more or less culture and development of each and every faculty of our mental being, music not excepted. Under these considerations the writer fosters the belief that in any congregation, in almost any parish or church, there may be found, out of every twenty individuals, nineteen that are sufficiently talented to become, by close application to music culture, good and reliable singers, capable of forming a choir that, as a whole, though termed congregational, would better by far redound to the beauty and glory of church worship than would a select choir, set apart exclusively for singing, while a majority are sitting by with closed mouths, accrediting great honor to the talented few, and seemingly unmindful of the Divine Presence they had assembled to worship. From these remarks I would not be understood to infer that no select choir should ever be heard or known to exist in a church, as evidently there are some church pieces, or portions thereof, so characterized as to be rendered far more impressive when performed by a few voices only, than they otherwise could be; but such renderings should be considered mere exceptions to the general rule. The fact should ever be apparent that church worship should be conducted on a principle, the basis of which should be sufficiently extensive to meet the demands of a religious community as a whole.

By way of appendage to this series of articles I would add that the various points taken up, as bearing upon the subject of music, are drawn mostly from scientific facts. Portions drawn from the stand-point of personal experience only may not all bear the test of superior reasoning; hence such parts are only fit to be left in the dark abyss of forgetfulness, while the author professes progress, ever onward and upward, grasping the true, and leaving the false, actuated and inspired by the beautiful motto, "EVER PURSUING, EVER STRIVING TO BECOME." Thus animated with the love for higher development in the lovely art of music, the explorations in this great field will become deeper and broader as the mind continues its researches after truths which, though now seen lost in hidden mystery, will yet be revealed in as perfect light as those numbered in the revelations of the past. Trusting and sincerely believing the "wheels of progress" will be ever kept in motion, bringing new and increasing light into every department of useful knowledge, I close, for a season, my essays upon music, and bid my readers an affectionate farewell.

PRAYER FOR ZION.

—O—
OTIS SAWYER.

Pour out thy spirit upon needy Zion,
Sustain all thy children while humbly they plead—
Help, Lord, O help them, and send faithful laborers
To work in thy vineyard, for great is the need!
O, God of the harvest, replenish thy garners
With choicest of fruit from the mountain and plain—
And fill every court in thy holy dominion,
Like rich golden fruit on a well-clustered vine.

Hear, we beseech Thee, Oh heavenly Father,
The remnant who've passed through the flood and the fire!

O God, Thee they serve, and they bow to no other,
Thy word and Thy will is their whole soul's desire.
Protect and preserve Thou, the holiest treasures
With which in Thy temple Thy wisdom appears—
The Ark and Shekina, that royal insignia—
A witness perpetual, JEHOVAH IS HERE!

God of the widow and fatherless orphan,
Whose vigilant eye views each sparrow that falls,
Thy mercy and favor to Zion now lengthen;
Thou art her deliverer and her all in all!
Yea, here for salvation Thy name Thou hast raised,
For kingdoms and people, afar off and near,
The Laws of Mount Zion on tablets engraved,
To which every nation on earth must give ear.

Now, even now, Lord, diffuse without measure,
The power of salvation and eternal life!
Renew the baptism of spirit and fire,
That Zion may win in this terrible strife?
O send forth Thy heralds to every nation,
And call, that the slumbering to judgment appear—
To enter through Jordan's rich stream for salvation,
O God, unto Zion, in strength do draw near!

CLOUDS.

—O—
MARTHA J. ANDERSON.

The sun in its splendor rose early at dawn,
Revealing the beauties of meadow and lawn;
For every green spear with a crystal drop gleamed,
As on them the golden shafts silently heamed;
Yet, if as by magic, in earliest day,
The glisten of diamonds had vanished away.
The brooklet came laughing from out of the wood,
As if 'twere intent on a mission of good;
So full were its waves as it dashed on its way,
It sent up, like incense, a beautiful spray,
But ere the sun reached its meridian course,
Its volume and motion had lost half their force.
The lake in its beauty (so placid and still)
Lay down at the foot of a steep, wooded hill,
Yet sunbeams were glancing just over the crest,
And lighting the ripples that danced on its breast,
Exerting the while a mysterious sway,
Which seemed to be drawing its moisture away.
The river rolled on 'neath the sun's vivid rays,
Reflecting a glory too bright for the gaze;
But soon was seen rising a mist, light as air,
And where was it going? O! who shall tell where?
Up, up it went floating, and sped o'er the hill,
An omen in future of good, or of ill.
The ocean swelled grandly, its billows rose high,
As if any power its strength could defy;
Yet subtle the force, and electric the glow,
That meets in its majesty wide ocean's flow.
The air is just tensioned with heat, to draw up
And take a good drink from old Neptune's great cup;

Away goes the nectar ambrosial and free,
Alike from the fountain, the ocean and sea.
The atmosphere gathered, but could not retain
The volatile vapors it held for its gain;
So upward they rose in ethereal space,
Where cloudland so changeful in fancy we trace,

The sprights of the wind, bound for mischief the word,

The gathering mists in confusion dispersed.
Soon the face of the sky from the east to the west,
Was covered with waves like a white foaming crest,

But, fitful as fancy, and fleet as a thought,
Behold, what a change in the aspect is wrought!
Like a fleece of white wool, just clipped from the ewe,

The clouds are spread over the deep vault of blue;
Now gathering closer, they tower on high,
And rest in their grandeur against the clear sky.
There's reared in the distance a castle so bright,
It gleams as if raised by the spirits of light;
Too soon it has vanished, and mountains of snow
Are rising, then melting beneath the sun's glow.
There are charlots of fire, and steeds of the wind,
Which leave in a moment no traces behind;
Then argosies, freighted for some distant shore,
Fold up their white sails and are heard of no more.
There the Elephant's seen, and the White Polar Bear,

The Seal and the Walrus float out on the air;
And thousands of wonders which meet the trained eye,

No conjuror casts in his magical die.
With signs of the weather this realm is replete—
They are heard from the lips of each friend that you meet;

"There are bars in the South," or "the morning sky's red,
Which will surely bring rain on the traveler's head."

Well founded this maxim, "If rain goes up hopping,

Then rain will assuredly come down a dropping."

The farmer will tell you when cloudless the sky
It often betokens a storm brooding nigh;
With keen observation to science allied,
The action of winds and of clouds are described.
Savans have explored this most wonderful field,
And facts that are noteworthy carefully yield;
Seven species of clouds are described with their names,

The result of the knowledge one scientist claims.
First Cirrus, the cloud formed the highest in air,
Resembles the tresses of light waving hair,
A change of the weather it seems to imply,
Rain, if it increases; wind, if it keeps high;
Fine weather if fringes descend from below,
And melt away quickly beneath the sun's glow.
Next, Cumulus forms in a low atmosphere,
In dense, convex masses 'twill often appear;
By the wise it is called the fair cloud of the day,
Beginning when morning shines over our way.
Its maximum reaches when Sol's at its height,
Then melts when approached by the shadows of night.

Now Stratus will nearest earth's surface be found,
In flat sheets extended above and around,
It forms when the sun has just passed from the sight,
And is termed, by its coming, the cloud of the night.

Its mists may be seen o'er the river and plain,
But does not betoken the coming of rain.
The days that oft follow this cloud of the night,
Are always remarkably tranquil and bright.
Cirro Cumulus forms in the atmosphere high,
Consisting of groups of small cumuli;
At different heights in flat strata 'tis seen
Reflecting the brightness of days sunny sheen.
In some latitudes, in the winter 'tis rare,
But in summer betokens the days that are fair.
'Tis the haughty cloud, some call "mackerel sky,"

With its tints at the sunset no painter can vie.
Cirro Stratus spreads out like a layer of sheets,
Which is apt to descend if disturbance it meets;
When high o'er the zenith, a light, gauzy shroud,
But near the horizon it forms a dense cloud;
'Tis changeable ever, though calm seems the air,
And indicates rain, though the weather be fair.
When low in the sky, it is seen to descend,
The rain will soon follow its course to attend.
If the weather is cold a "Scotch mist" it will form,

A "hat" on the mountain peaks if it is warm:
At first it appears like a mere hazy light,
Which envelops the moon in a circle at night.
Atmospheric disturbance it seems to foretell,
Yet on all its changes we'll no longer dwell.
Cumulo Stratus is small cumuli,
United by stratus like clouds, dense and high,

Called indefinite clouds, when to earth ne'er descend,

Unless in their changing with others they blend.
If they rise in huge masses of singular form,
Precursors they prove of a dark thunder storm.
If Cirrus appears at the time, high in air,
The weather which follows will not then be fair;
But if Cumulus Cirrus above shall appear,
The rain will soon pass, and the weather be clear.
The cloud we call Nimbus, prepared as it lowers,
Descends to the earth, with its copious showers.

O cloudland! so varied, so old, yet so new!
Through fancy and science thy glories we view;
And while we're discerning the signs of thy face,
The skill of an infinite artist we trace.
Ever learning sweet lessons of wisdom and love,
From scenes all around us, below and above.
Mt. Lebanon, N. Y.

COMMUNITY PRINCIPLES AS A PART OF CHRISTIANITY.

—O—
NELSON CHASE.

"Then Peter began to say unto him, Lo, we have left all and have followed thee."

"And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's,"

"But he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life."

Mark 10: 28, 29, 30.

FROM these sayings of Jesus, we begin to date a foundation for community life in the church of Christ. The principle was carried out in the life and character of the little band of twelve who followed Jesus when upon earth, and the principle was confirmed and established by the church at Jerusalem, at the day of Pentecost, when "they were all filled with the Holy Ghost," and "were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." Acts 4: 31, 32.

Hence we are to understand, a religious community is a community of interests, embracing a people whose possessions are the property of all; all having a voice in its management, subordinate to a head.

A man owning a farm has the right of its direction. It is under the control of his family, subject to the head of said family. It is under his control to stock and improve it; otherwise, it is an object neither of attraction nor interest. In communistic societies the spirit is not changed, the principle undergoes no revolution, the effect is consequently the same.

If community means simply a people drawn together as a convenience for economy in the business acts of life, having no religious principle interwoven, the interests of the body being held by a privileged class, whose duties required their talents and labors for the support and protection of the body which had no voice in the institution, no right to ask, why do ye so, it is no other than master and slave, bond and free, producing caste, high and low, rich and poor. The government differs widely from a theocracy, remote from Christian authority. It is oligarchy.

Community, as a part of Christianity, is designed to take hold of the selfishness of man; otherwise, self remains un subdued. Individuals personally assuming independent control of community interest cannot be in the work of governing or destroying in themselves a selfish animal nature; on the contrary, they foster and nourish it, causing greater development and growth, thus choking and destroying even the Christian virtues; not only preventing themselves, but other pure-minded souls who would not be selfish, from the enjoyment of that to which they are justly entitled.

As one interested in the unfoldment of greater truths, in an open door for the increase of righteousness, I ask for myself, for my brethren, yea, for all men, that we cultivate without reserve and with greater zeal, more love, more union, the basis of all that is great and good. Let us combine with the principle of community of interest, that of the true virgin character, each one working unselfishly for the encouragement, the strength, the comfort and good of every other one, laboring in our souls to become purified in spirit; first, condemning wrong in ourselves, ignoring slander and backbiting, laying aside every weight and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and putting away from our hearts all that tends to produce hard feelings. Here is our protection, our justification. Here we find peace flowing like a river, bringing to our souls life and joy eternal.

AWAKENING.

JANE A. CORNELL.

See o'er the hill-tops the sunlight is breaking;
Adown in the valley its golden beams fall;
Souls from the darkness of sin are awakening,
Answering the voice of the Christ-Spirit's call.
All through the night, with most gentle entreating,
He hath called unto sinners, in mercy and love;
And the promises sure, of the Father repeating,
Hath pointed to mansions, preparing above.
Awake now O Zion! and shake off thy slumber!
For lo! there is wafting from every shore,
The great witness-clouds, which no man can number;
And soon drooping low, it shall rest at thy door.
Arouse, then, O Zion! fling open thy portal!
And put on thy garments of beauty and might,
For see now approaching are spirits immortal,
Who humbly are seeking for guidance and light.
They are weary and famished, for long have they wandered
In paths of transgressions and highways of sin;
In riotous living their substance have squandered;
O stretch forth thy hand now and gather them in.
For Oh! they are coming, repentant and chastened,
A sense of their loss doth each bosom oppress;
And to thee, as unto a mother, they've hastened,
To pour out their sorrows—their sins to confess.
Prepare them a greeting, receive them with gladness,
O spread them a banquet, kind welcome accord;
Speak comforting words, consoling their sadness;
They come not unbidden, they are guests of thy Lord.
Shakers, N. Y.

A CHARACTERISTIC PRAYER.

O, Divine presence, Thou whom we call God—
Oh, angels and ministering spirits! Oh, common instincts of a divine humanity, grant to regenerate badly generated Spiritualists; grant to revivify and quicken their religious faculties; to expand their selfish natures, and warm their cold stolid hearts with heavenly love, and especially grant, Oh, immortalized Intelligences, to so touch and inspire the souls of all the stingy, niggardly, pennypinching Spiritualists of the land, that they shall cheerfully open their pocket-books and liberally support such genuine mediums, such trance and inspirational speakers as the heavenly hosts have raised up to demonstrate future existence, to heal the sick, comfort the afflicted, and wipe away the tears from the mourners' eyes. Amen.

Thus, our dear, noble, self-sacrificing and ever benevolent Brother, J. M. Peebles, prays for Spiritualists. Are there not some other persuasions that would be benefited by employing his generous spirit to pray for them?
Let us reflect.

THE SHAKER.

Monthly—60 cents per annum.

A DUAL ADVOCATE OF CHRIST PRINCIPLES.

WOULD YOU

BECOME a Shaker? Yield not to the impulse without fully considering the demands of Shakerism upon you, and its immediate and ultimate consequences.

1. Settle all just debts; reconcile by compromise, or to the utmost, creditors who have trusted you.

2. Are you sin-sick? Not only desirous of no more sinful indulgences, but so heartily disgusted with sins of the past, that a clean, clear confession of the same would be of all things most desirable, and which would prompt a repentance, that means no more returning to the sins confessed? then come and be a Shaker.

3. Are you able to be "like unto a little child," subject and willing to be taught; interposing nothing that would prompt egotism or personal superiority, nor aggrandizement? You are ripe for the harvest interpreted by Shakerism; "Ask and ye shall receive."

4. Are you ready to become a brother or sister the rest of life, as a Christian substitute for husband and wife? Does the celibate condition of those anointed as Christ strike you as superior to the best, even perfected, system of the earthly, sexual relation?

5. Are you willing, anxious, to enter with your wealth and poverty; your physical strength and weakness; your talents and your deficiencies; with your worldly ambitions and spiritual aspirations and convictions, into the furnace of trial, probation, approval and unreserved consecration? The "Door" is opened to your knock.

6. Do you love peace better than unholy strife? Would you give kind words for harsh ones? Could you resist the temptations to resentment? Would you willingly part with unphysiological conditions and unspiritual desires, the relinquishment of which would cause you to shun the policy of the hypocrite and accept the principles of the peacemaker? Do you look for conditions not to be found in a worldly life, even in its best estate? "Seek, and you will find" these where true Shakerism is illustrated.

7. Count the cost: No more of the worldly, fleshly, "old creation." A new life is expected; but so clean, clear, simple and without ostentation, that a child can comprehend and accept it. To leave the elements of the world, however good; and to accept the "living-sacrifice" practices in life that will prove a baptism of the new man and woman—Christ! Would you be a Christian? Compare the Christianity of Jesus with the above presentation of Shakerism, and then, WOULD YOU?

DISTINCTION OF SHAKER COMMUNISM.

Our communism with certain classes of people unjustly bears the reputation of being bigoted, narrow, and too recluso. From these we are receiving constant invitations to enter into deeper sympathies with other organizations, multiplying so rapidly in this age of the world.

Our communism means more than an earthly competence and home. It attaches itself with grave importance to those superior elements which determine that we are ultra religionists. There is a salvation derived from temporal co-operation; but this is only a minor salvation, compared with the grand feature of salvation from the great paucity and bondage of our sins. Distinction from organizations which live on the animal plane of life is a positive necessity of our existence as such religious people. We cannot in conscience, having the perpetuity of our celibate principle in mind, join hands with those who are seeking sensual delights by an opposing conduct. With us, the struggle to maintain for the spirit the mastery over the flesh, is an all important one. For this have we separated ourselves physically from worldly associations and policies; for this, only, have we entered into compacts with each other in our various gospel homes—the better to triumph over the "lusts of the flesh, of the eye and the pride of life." Active sympathy, even to a limited extent, with communists engaged in the continuance and exercise of unchristian practices, however good such practices may be, judged from a worldly standard, would be to us a return to what we have vomited—the dabbling again with uncleanness from which we have been washed and resurrected. Said our great leader in substance: "I am not of the world, so be ye not so conformed." To us, that great light is a directing testimony in present and future life, and unmistakably says: Be virgins; love one another, with that superior love which seeks the maintenance of virginity in all unselfishness. Be peaceable—an outgrowing condition from genuine virginity. Keep unspotted from all worldliness.

Occupying, as probationers, a middle ground between the heavens and the earth—attempting with some success, a heaven on earth—we are casting from us as fast as possible, the barnacles that prevent a living progress toward the community spirit of advanced conditions. We look hence to the spirit land: large homes for kindred spirits—made so by similarity of life hereafter. Experiencing the larger spirituality from an entire absence of the practice or passions of the reproductive elements; from whatever engenders worldly strive; from selfish relations of single or marital promotion, and from the hampering influences of political combinations and worldly co-partnerships, we find it an utmost necessity that we maintain a peculiar, superior and unflinching distinction from those whose theology teaches, and whose sense of religion permits, indulgences not born of the spirit of Christ. The testimony of Christ is not aggressive, per se. As an illustration: Jesus lived as a Christian should; in all purity; in communism; in peace; in distinction from the world. His injunction was, "Go into all the world and preach these," with the ever winsome, inviting spirit of the Christ: "Let whosoever will, let them come." No compulsion; no prevention. "Herein is the Christian's comfort; if you desire its fruits, sow no more to the flesh, but to the Spirit." We rejoice at every effort communism makes for the alleviation of humanity, and it has made many already; but we, seeking the communism of the heavens, cannot commingle with the merely earthly, communistic elements, now becoming so popular. Our commanism admits of but one class. Our bishops, our elders, trustees, deacons, rank and file, are required by our community contract to live similarly and after the purity and unselfishness of the heavenly church. As oil and water will not of themselves blend; as flesh and spirit will not thus agree; so we, determined to maintain our distinction for the sake of superior spirituality, give no consent, nor will admit of any element that would inaugurate a harmony, that will cause our clean garments to trail at all in worldly lusts. ☆

THE SHAKER AND ITS MISSION.

WE are in receipt of frequent evidences that THE SHAKER, true to the purposes for which it originated, is an educator in the societies of believers, and particularly a comforter to those sin-sick souls "not of our fold as yet." From brethren and sisters throughout our Zion home consoling evidences of appreciation greet our ears and encourage our souls. But unmistakable proofs come out occasionally that THE SHAKER, true to its mission, is being found by "the lost sheep" of spiritual Israel, and by such is hallowed as the morning star, at least, of a new, spiritual day. One lady in New York accidentally (apparently) was handed a copy. Becoming more and more interested, she determined to present a copy of volume VI to each of her near relatives (quite a number), because "I know of nothing better that I can offer them as reading," etc., and adding a few of the kindest words of appreciation to the publisher, determined to be a life subscriber. Another lady in Cambridgeport, Mass., perchance found a copy of the OCTOBER NUMBER. In a letter to the editor she says:

"It is only a year since I first knew of the existence of such societies as the SHAKERS. I tried to obtain more information of them, but failed, until last week I obtained the OCTOBER NUMBER of your paper. After carefully perusing its pages, I feel strongly impressed to become one of your number, for I now am assured I am directed by God to do so. I find, from the reading of your paper, what the principles of Shakerism are, and that I have been led to adopt these in my past experience, and am striving to live them entire. True, these views have so separated me from the world and from my own family, that I stand alone; but I am determined to live this life, that to me is right. I am twenty-six years old, unmarried," etc.

And there are many such, only needing the animating torch of THE SHAKER to lighten and quicken their perceptions, conceptions and convictions, thus making them workers for the cause, and living testimonies of an exceedingly righteous life in the midst of their fellows. God has not forsaken the world. Go, little SHAKER! "In the morning sow thy seed, and at evening withhold not thy hand." The heartfelt necessity of such a medium as THE SHAKER for a missionary, and the constantly recurring evidences that it is dutifully at work, are alone sufficient inducements to "toil on, struggle on," with none other 'recompense of reward.' If this world is ever ransomed and regenerated by the resurrection of individuals to Christ's life, it must be "bought with a price," and those having the gospel must pay it, and work for it. We personally care exceedingly what course others may take, and that those who would be good men and women everywhere might lend us their active sympathies, and share with us the burdens of missionary gospel duty, which, however unremunerative financially, are rich with satisfaction and justification. Go and come, little SHAKER, and God speed thy efforts! ☆

OUR PROSPECTUS.

WITH this issue, Vol. 6 of THE SHAKER closes. Vol. 7 will begin with an enlarged form, and with a purpose of increased interest and usefulness. Its patrons have decided that it must not rest on laurels won,—that the present is not the time to discontinue efforts put forth for the regeneration of the race. There are multitudes who would seriously miss THE SHAKER, should it "rest from its labors;" while with not a few, such discontinuance would prove an unequalled catastrophe. We have large reason to be very grateful to its many friends, for their disinterested efforts in its behalf; and for their words and deeds of cheer to both editor and publisher. We are confident that we will make Vol. 7 even more acceptable than its predecessor. New themes of exceeding interests will be introduced. A department of "SOCIAL LIFE SKETCHES" of the Shakers will be added. The department of MUSIC will be continued with much improvement. A continued notice will appear in every number answering the question: "WHAT SHALL I DO TO BECOME A SHAKER?" We ask for the continued company of our present subscribers; earnestly hoping they will aid us in circulating truth, by assisting in the enlargement of our subscription lists. All may rest assured that no pains will be spared to have every department of THE SHAKER an advance upon the same of 1876, and that no departure from its main purpose — the illustration of radical, christian truths — will for a moment be considered. ☆

EDITORIAL NOTES.

UNLESS individuals are more than casual observers, the subject of Communism will appear in statu quo, or on the wane. But we have assurances—moral, social, political and, more than all, spiritual—evidences of our senses—that Communism never ranked so highly, nor was ever more ardently desired, numerically speaking, than to-day. The majority, however, embody in their desired resolutions of organization, so many elements of human, perverted selfishness, that if organizations are born, it is too frequently to die after an ephemeral existence. Nevertheless, good will come of all these.

Those who would be Shakers—members of a "new creation"—"children resurrected" above the "world," are invited to read "WOULD YOU?" in another column. Therein is embraced, in epitome, the whole cross of Christ, according to our understanding of the gospel introduced by Jesus, the Anointed. To bread and butter thieves—those whose lives embrace but the seven constituents—five loaves and two fishes—such paragraphs will prove a bitter pill and be refused. But to the sincere seeker after the Christ life—to the weary and heavily laden with sin, "WOULD YOU" will prove the "pearl of great price," and be accepted as a rest, worth more than worlds without it.

The grandest phase of human development presented to our humanity is the evolution from the sensual to the spiritual; from selfish to unselfish benevolence; from Adamite followers to Christ disciples; from men and women, subject to anti-christian impulses that make and people the earth, to the conditions of resurrection, representing the Christ in Jesus, and by the possession of which, "heaven on earth," is already begun. To be a Christian means more than mere profession. It means a "new creature" with whom "old things are done away," and the evolution into practices not sustained by fleshly indulgences. Who are Christians in deed?

Not until mankind love their neighbors better than themselves, will the pendulum of progress impress the mind with true Christian demands. While "doing unto others as we would they should do unto us" is very golden, the entire crucifixion of selfishness in behalf of the brotherhood can set no bounds; and this can alone rouse the soul from the mere letter of the rule to the most wholesome, heavenly consecration. Before the crooked stick of perverted humanity can be made as straight as the golden rule, it must be bent and retained in excess of what that rule demands. ☆

A FLYING VISIT.

SHAKERS, N. Y., November 12, 1876.

MY DEAR W.—You are aware that important business of THE SHAKER called me to the city of Concord, N. H.; and being only twelve miles from the beautiful Shaker Village at Canterbury, I made this my home for a couple of days. I am very happy to state to you that an almost perfect system of finances and spirituality makes this Society a model of neatness, comfort and heaven on earth. Here lives the living publisher of THE SHAKER. Everywhere improvement was visible. Paint has been spread by unsparing hands. Repairs had made things appear as good as new. New buildings for threshing and the storage of ice were in progress of erection. The people here are a noble colony. Nearly one hundred persons in the Center Family, and the majority between sixteen and forty years of age! It would be difficult to imagine a scene, where loving kindness, living industry and devotion to good works were more prominent than here. Order reigns supremely. I attended public meeting on Sunday, and addressed the assemblage in my unqualified manner. The accompanying testimonies delivered by word and song were many, and spiritually effective in the extreme. I learned of an interesting feature at this place. Every "turn" of the sisterhood in the kitchen department, began and completed a literary periodical for the month they were so engaged. Casually looking over the "Cook's Manual," I found it contained some very good recipes, excellent articles on a variety of subjects applicable to the department in which the editor and contributors were engaged, such as "Cleanliness, Economy, Patience," etc. I found under the head of "Accidents," the number of dishes that had been broken, etc. In its numerical department I found the number of loaves of bread, pies, cakes and biscuits that had been made during the month, and a funny paragraph under "Obituary," informed all that an unusually "large rat had departed!" This periodical is read to the family every month. I thought it an excellent feature of the kitchen.

The singing of this Society is, perhaps, unequalled; and the greatest pains are being taken to give thoroughness in musical education, both vocally and instrumentally. Some have thought, my dear W., that Shaker Societies must rely on adult converts from the outer world for their maintenance, and have carelessly referred to the uncertainty of youth among us. But while all youth must be tried and proved, and thus, many have chosen the inferior life of the flesh, rejecting the superior spirituality of a Shaker life, it must be remembered, how very large the majority is among us, of those whose lives have never been stained by worldly grossness! You and I, and many scores we know full well, are among this number. I have not only no objections to the conversion of adult converts to our faith, but ardently desire the large accomplishment thereof; yet the youth of our Zion vie with such "equal to the best steel."

I dropped in on Shirley Village, and was surprised at the vivacity and youthfulness of its many, beautiful Believers. The large number to whom good Eldress Sophronia presented me, encouraged me to make you happier by the narration; and the earnest of love manifested for these dear young people by their seniors, seemed to say: "Shirley depends on the faithfulness and dutifulness of her young people!" How pretty the village! How exceedingly kind her people! "I was a stranger, and they took me in," almost "killing one with kindness!" Howells might well have said, after all, "The half of Shirley's virtues cannot be told." I stopped at Harvard; and before I could beg their hospitality, I was assured the whole village was mine while I remained! I was hungry, tired, homesick; I was fed, rested and made most happily at home by these God-fearing, soul-loving Christians. My joy, in sweet repose, at Harvard's expense, was sufficient to induce the belief, that the clean, Shaker bed, is a missionary element too frequently unrecognized. Harvard, perhaps, is unsurpassed in the neatness of its appearance. Passing along the avenue that separates its dooryard, all the buildings appear to be in the most perfect condition, and each seemed to waft a most loving invitation to the sin-sick soul, to accept of it as a haven. The unbounded kindness of this people bespoke that God was here; and I believe with Titcomb, that "God loves these Shakers;" and "adores" them and their surroundings, regardless of Titcomb.

Having to wait several hours at Springfield, Mass., I learned I could reach Enfield, Conn., spend two or three hours, and return before my train left for the west. Twenty-eight minutes from Springfield, through a beautiful country, convey you to the na-tiest depot of this country, upon which "SHAKER STATION" is most prettily lettered. This depot is a Shaker production, and is most complete in all its parts. At this depot, was Elder George Wilcox, holding the reins, that guided the horse, so beautifully chestnut, and so brilliant of movement, that we confessed our envy, while we moved at the rate of twelve miles the hour! Truly, we were puzzled to know, whether the horse made the happiness of his driver, or the benevolence of the driver made this horse invaluable. Enfield is building the house or dwelling of Greek-cross figure, and of mammoth proportions! The people need it. In the center family, nearly ninety souls reside; and most of these are under forty years! Count again, on the side of Shaker youth! While every thing else wears the happy look of home, a large, convenient dwelling at the Center, is a most welcome and needed structure. Some thirty men were adding to completion, a building that will contain above its foundation stones, nearly three quarters of a million bricks! And passing, with that discreet, almost angelic Shaker—Elder Thomas Damon—over its capacious apartments, I was led to congratulate the young and old of this branch of our Zion on their soon to be enjoyed mansion; and would give notice to "the weary and heavy laden" that "there is rest for you" at Enfield, Conn., if you will pay the Christian price.

Excuse my length of letter, dear W., but I have flown almost home; I alighted at Hancock, and a fine young man, driving a fine old horse, invited me to ride "as far as he went." In his endeavor to find me out, and my sudden appreciation of taciturnity in preventing the disclosure, we had ascended the mountain, through the beautiful Shaker village of Hancock, when my host then thought of those who awaited his return. I descended the hill to Mt. Lebanon! And now, dear W., let your heart beat in unison with mine at the approach! Beautiful scene! First I meet the South, then the Second, then the Second Order of the Church, then the Church Family itself! All seems complete. The ruins are gone. A mansion replaces the good, old house of yore. The "MINISTRY'S HOME" is well named, even if I give it. The people here are in happy mood, ascending scale, and in harmony. I hear sweet songs—I stop for a moment at the door of "Lycium Hall," and fifty voices are being trained by a Boston "COLISEUM" director. We said "lucky, happy youth"—count three times for youth—and passed on to the stately North. Here, hospitality multiplied by many numbers, was showered upon your unworthy brother. Here, you will find the presentation of between eighty and a hundred souls, bound heavenward, and but few wanting the necessary "wedding dress."

Here preside Elder F. W. Evans and Eldress Antoinette Deolittle; and here, songs and happiness flowed to my soul unnumbered and unmeasured. January number will contain a beautiful hymn, "Over the River," from this place. Oh this grand, novitate order. Of these things I could write ad infinitum, but visit these and you will find a noble people, followers of the noblest of leaders.

GEO. ALBERT.

A Boston minister who makes much of the higher Christian life, boasts that he has not voted for ten years. Useful man!—Investigator.

This slur is from the Investigator, which is continually illustrating the unchristian worldliness of the clergy! We say "useful man," and mean it—useful, so far, in repeating the example of unworldliness in the Master, Christ, which the clergy are scarcely anywhere noted for. We only wish that the clergy would progress in such "usefulness," until they would be to their flocks what Jesus was to his—an unworldly communist; a virgin peacemaker! Wherein is the Christian reason why Christians should not "FOLLOW" the Lord? and the especial reason, why Boston ministers, and all others, should not be bright, living examples for the people, in all that pertained to Jesus, the Christ? Ministers, herein is the correct atonement—herein the true resurrection—herein the works, combined with faith, that demonstrate genuine Christianity. ☆

CORRESPONDENCE.

MT. LEBANON, October 30, 1876.

E. W. LAWS, Esteemed Friend:

Your letter of 21st inst., at hand. We begin to see eye to eye. Why not? To my perception, your heart is more elevated than your understanding. It should be so. Feeling has no fellow—not even reason.

Your inquiry, "What would become of the world, if all were Shakers," is as pertinent as it is common.

"The oranges upon an orange tree do not all ripen together. The natural man and woman are as green fruit on humanity's tree. The first Adam and Eve—father and mother of the generative order—sow. The second Adam and Eve—father and mother of the resurrection order—reap. Jesus was cut off from the earth, by the Christ-spirit, so that none could declare his generation, nor exclaim behold thy son, or daughter.

Does it seem incredible that God should raise the dead—resurrect natural man and woman, before they leave the body—a kind of first fruits of the resurrection, as the apostles and early Christians were wont to call themselves?

Shakers are first fruits. The great command was not to man only, but to all the animal kingdom. Goats obey it.

The multiply and replenish law is inherent in natural man and woman, as in other animals. It is obeyed with as much fidelity by such as never heard tell of the statute, as by pious bible readers.

We, upon whom the end of the generative earth has come, obey the new commandment—"love one another,"—not as husband and wife, but as brethren and sisters.

When wars shall cease to the ends of the generative earth, by want of food and room to be, it will be manifest that such types of humanity as are able to receive the higher law, should live the virgin life. And thus genuine Christianity will redeem the earth from depopulating crimes, and furnish checks to excessive population.

Two orders of people are coming up. To which will you belong?

Of the new earth, generation will be the corner-stone, but a man will not touch a woman save for offspring.

In the new heavens, man does not touch women, generatively, at all.

It is as natural for a highly developed intellectual man, like Swedenborg, to live a celibate, as for a highly developed spiritual man, like Jesus, to forsake father, mother, brothers, sisters, houses and lands, for Christ's sake.

Then his father, mother, brothers, sisters and children are they, who through the Christ-spirit, have the word of God and obey it. They are a community, like the Angels in Heaven, for they are in Heaven. In love,

F. W. EVANS.

MEMPHIS, TENN., October 20, 1876.

DEAR EDITOR ALBERT—Moved by the spirit this calm, quiet autumn morning, I feel inclined to have a little pen-and-ink talk with you. Have you tried to listen?

Before me lies the October number of THE SHAKER. It is a gem—clean, tidy, terse, and spiritually speaking, well put together. One is half inclined to say, that such a sheet might be transplanted to paradise, to be there read by the saints that dally gather in and around the golden gardens of God. Not that it is perfect, for perfection does not pertain to earthly productions—"first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear." It may be all summed up in the word, cycles!

Surely, THE SHAKER is a missionary going "into all the world" (or ought to), preaching the gospel of purity, of peace, and a pentecostal community of interests. Those in the "outer court," reading its pages, often speak in its praise. No truth perishes, no good word is lost out of the universe. The missionary, therefore, is a moral necessity. Jesus recognized this fact. The apostles were missionaries. The martyrs and the saints of by-gone ages were missionaries. God's angels to-day are missionaries, ministering to mortals under the influence and inspiration of the Christ-spirit. As yet, there are spiritualists, and possibly Shakers, who are opposed to missionary work. Their actions, if not their words, prove this to be the case. "We have good friends, a good home, a good gospel, let us sit down and enjoy it." Exactly, and so the commonest dog, acting quite as rationally says, "I've got a good thing, a good nice bone, and I propose to sit down and gnaw it!" Such selfishness is to be expected of the dog, but not of man made in the image of God. True greatness is based upon moral goodness. And all great, noble full-orbed souls, having found the "pearl of great price,"—pure and undefiled religion—necessarily desire to aid others in finding it. And here comes in the desired principle of self-sacrifice.

The Philadelphia conference of spiritualists, denominated the "new departure," has created a tremendous stir in the ranks of spiritualism. Stagnant pools need stirring. And thunder storms purify the air. It is questionable whether the stiff conservative quietness, characterizing headstones in grave-yards, is desirable. The "new movement" meant organization, order, and religious culture, nothing more, but that was too much for most spiritualists. It is quite impossible for them to see the difference between religion and theology, a creed and declaration of principles, the spirit-world and the Christ-heavens of purity and holiness. In brief, multitudes of spiritualists, like some Shakers, stand upon the material and phenomenal plans of life. Delighting to indulge the passion for curiosity, and to witness the prodigies attendant upon physical manifestations, they forget the apostolic injunction, "leave the first principles and go on into perfection." Admitting the truth of the cradle-bed tale, that "a cat jumped over the moon," did that phenomenon squelch the slyness and thieving tendency of the cat? did it remove any treachery from the great cat-klugdom of America, or did it enlighten, morally benefit and spiritually save those who witnessed the wonderful phenomenon? Jesus spoke in parables, may I not write in them?

It is my sorrowful privilege to meet spiritualists of twenty-five years standing, and some Shakers too, who are half-a-dying to see a spiritual phenomenon—a wonder, a marvel, a sign! We want "to know," for "knowledge," say they "is the world's saviour." "There was never a more villainously untrue sentence spoken than this. Why, the most known, are often the most wicked men. Forgers are the penmen. Ruloff, the Hugulist and mathematician, of Ithaca, N. Y., killed his wife and child. Dr. Webster, the scholar and chemist, of Boston, murdered Parkman. To-day there are over forty graduates of colleges in the Penitentiary located at Auburn, N. Y. And yet "knowledge is the world's saviour!" Did a knowledge of the world, a knowledge of the arts and sciences, save these criminals? To announce, is to refute such a position. I would not be understood as being an advocate of ignorance, far from it; but Christ, that is, the Christ principle of love and truth, purity and holiness, leading to a well-ordered life, that is the world's saviour. To this end the apostle taught that in Christ "were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." The masses are too material. They dwell more upon the shell than the soul of things. Selfishness is the world's curse. Unselfish love, and a willing sacrifice, these lead to the golden gates of the city immortal.

Human life is a journey. Jesus baptized his pathway with tears. Our travel may be a cross, our limbs may grow weary, our hearts may become faint, and our souls cry out for angel-helpers, as we near the hill-top—where there are awaiting the faithful, crowns of glory. I mean to close the door tightly against temptation, and run with patience the race set before me. My love to all.

Most truly thine,

J. M. PEEBLES.

AGRICULTURAL.

THE Austrian system of making sour hay is very simple. It consists in digging long graves or trenches, four feet in depth by six or eight in breadth. The newly cut clover and grass is crammed into the trench and tramped tightly down. When the trench is quite full, so that the contents are a little above the surface, the whole is then covered up with a foot or fifteen inches of earth, just as a heap of potatoes is covered. Prof. Wrightson states that the preservation is complete, and the wetter the fodder when it goes together the better. No salt is mixed with the grass. He further states that this "sour hay" affords a capital winter fodder, and when cut out with hay spades it is found to be rich brown in color and very much liked by stock. Pulp left in the manufacture of sugar from beet is also preserved in the same way, and, it is stated, will keep fresh for five or six years. Although Prof. Wrightson does not say so, still we imagine that green vetches may also be stored by the same method. When we formerly referred to this matter, we expressed a wish that some of our readers would make a careful trial of the Austrian mode of preserving green fodder.—London Times.

GREASING WAGONS: A good wagon costs a considerable sum, and it should be taken proper care of, and made to last as long as possible. Few persons understand the importance of thoroughly oiling the axles, etc., of wagons and carriages, and still fewer know which are the most suitable lubricators to use, and the proper way of applying them. A well-made wheel will endure ordinary wear from ten to twenty-five years, if care is taken to use the right amount of the proper lubricator; but if this matter is not attended to, a wheel will be used up in five or six years. Lard should never be used on a wagon, for it will penetrate the hub and work itself out around the tenons of the spokes and spoil the wheel. Tallow is the best lubricator for wooden axletrees, and castor oil for iron. When oiling an axletree the spindle should be wiped clean with a cloth wet with spirits of turpentine, and then apply a few drops of castor oil near the shoulder and end. When greasing an axletree, just enough grease should be applied to give a light coating; more does more harm than good, by working out and damaging the hub.

COAL ashes have a wonderful effect upon pear trees, especially those growing in light soil. The ashes of last winter were used around the trees in liberal quantities, and those so treated have outgrown any thing in the orchard. Some that were even sickly, and apparently ready to give up their hold on life, have been restored to perfect health by these remedies.

A WESTERN farmer says he has cured and preserved his broom-corn crop in a superior condition, by cutting, and, in six hours afterward, piling it between layers of hay. Stacking in the western country is the rule, and he claims that the hay was both roof and ventilator.

COLORING BUTTER: We use butter with its natural color only. All coloring is a useless fraud, unless selling color is useful, and we are sorry to know that some otherwise reputable Farm Papers give the fraud a countenance and recommendation.

A HORSE-SPARER.

THE German War Minister has lately caused experiments to be made with an apparatus devised by M. Fehrmann, and called a Pferdeschoner (literally, horse-sparer). "It is meant to diminish the fatigue of horses in drawing vehicles, as also the chances of rupture of the shaft or traces. It consists of a number of India-rubber plugs separated from each other by iron rundles; the whole is contained in a cylindrical metallic case, and a metallic rod, fixed to the last rundle and traversing the case, is a means of compressing the caoutchouc rings. The length of the system is 0.30 m. (about a foot). Two are required for each horse. They are interposed between the traces and the trace-hooks, thus forming an elastic pad between the horse and the weight to be drawn. In beginning to pull, horses do not make a gradually increasing effort, but generally precipitate themselves on their traces with a sudden shock, wasting their strength and probably doing injury. Fehrmann's apparatus remedies this, by the gradual compression of the caoutchouc rings. The initial effort required of the horse is less, and then it progressively increases." According to the report of the experiments, the effort required under various circumstances is diminished from 18 to 40 per cent by the use of this contrivance, which is certainly a sensible one, and ought to come into general use throughout the world. It is simple and inexpensive withal.

COMMUNITY IDEAS.

"THE family should be a community. To make it truly so, there must be common interest. Alas, for that household where the father's business, the mother's social cares, and the children's sports and pleasures, are not shared by each other! Then it will not be strange if the expenditure is out of proportion to the income, and if the companions and resorts of the children are evil. Happy that home, where the cares and joys are so divided that the former are not oppressive and the latter are multiplied—where the hearts grow closer as the years roll by, so that the separations which must come to every family are only bodily, and therefore temporary!"—Arthur's Mag.

A little common sense, digesting the above paragraph, teaches a lesson which individuals, if dullards or determined self-seekers, would not learn until, so far as their lives are concerned, Communities, Shaker Organizations, etc., came to an end.

The one-man or one-woman power is a disorganizer, either in families or societies—a combination of families. Whoever has attempted it, has either experienced a success in inevitable disruption of the unselfish determinations of societies, or in his or her own personal degradation. If there exists a curse for any, there remains a very unpleasant reward for one who uses the consecrated labors of others for sinister, selfish—and when it arrives so far—devilish ends! ☆

BOOK NOTICES.

PROF. HUXLEY IN AMERICA: This is one of The Tribune's extras, and is sold in sheet for 10 cts., or in pamphlet 25, etc. It is made up of verbatim reports of that great philosopher's lectures in this country. His three lectures on Evolution are embraced in this Extra. The issuing of these cheap pamphlets may be a money-making operation; but it is one of the best means of spreading knowledge, and the knowledge much needed by the people that has yet been discovered. We call especial attention to what Huxley calls the "Milton hypothesis." Address, The Tribune, N. Y.

S. R. Wells & Co. have just issued a very unique little volume upon "HOW TO SING," and by some it will be considered an indispensable companion. It purports to be a dialogue between Preceptor and Pupil, and treats upon a great variety of musical subjects, pertaining particularly to the voice. As our readers are very interested in this subject, they will address the publishers, at 737 Broadway, N. Y., inclosing 50 cents.

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN DARWINISM AND SPIRITUALISM is a pamphlet written by our friend and brother, J. M. Peebles, and published by Colby & Rich, 9 Montgomery place, Boston, Mass. The telling blows which this brightest light of Spiritualism gives in favor of his favorite theme, is an assurance that if any one can settle this conflict, it is J. M. Peebles. See Adv.

P. Garrett & Co., publishers, Philadelphia, are issuing a series of volumes, each of which contains one hundred selections from the choicest literature of our times. A copy, No. 4, we have been favored with. Among the 100 pieces we find the almost inimitable poems, "Daisy and I are Out," and Phebe Cary's "Nearer Home," either of which is worth the price of the book. 75 cents, cloth; 30 cents, paper.

Bound volumes of THE SHAKER, for 1876, can be procured at this office; sent post-paid, to any address, for $1.10. First come, first served. Order before January, 1877.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

REPEATED experiments have proved that, in school-rooms lighted by windows on both sides, the children suffer more or less from injured vision, and so important has the subject been considered in Germany, that a law has lately been passed forbidding such windows in schools.

TESTING THE PURITY OF WATER.

Some experiments have been recently made with a very simple process, to test organic impurities in water, that are worthy of further trial. The process consists in filling half-pint bottles with the water to be tested, and then adding one gramme (about 15 grains) of powdered sugar. In one experiment, boiled distilled water and no air remained unchanged for fifty days. In another, impure water assumed a milky hue in two days, and in three days had a froth on top. These experiments are easily repeated, and they may prove valuable in pointing readily to wholesome and unwholesome water. The milky appearance is the result of the development of certain fungoid growths.

ORGANIZATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

The Spirit world, through their medium, Jesus, has spoken plainly and concisely of the principle that shall govern in the "New Order," and spiritual era or dispensation which we find recorded in the 20th chapter, 25th, 26th and 27th verses of Matthew, and culminated in practical operation with his followers at the Pentecostal period, recorded in the 2d chapter of Acts.

To give up all for each others' sakes, as the primitive Christians did, is what is meant "For Christ's sake;" for Christ labored for others' sakes, or for equality for all, which is natural and just, or spiritual. Hence in the "New Dispensation," God, a principle of love and justice will be the only organizer; for we shall have a church without a creed; a kingdom without a king; a state without a governor or a government, and dwell on the earth as the angels or spirits do in heaven, or as the birds in the groves.

FAITH IN GOD.

ENFIELD, N. H.

1st. Why thus fainting, why thus doubting? Let thy faith be firm in God, Though the earth is in commotion, Smitten by affliction's rod.
 2nd. Let the favored ones of Israel, Zion's inmates one and all, Stand through every threatening peril, Faithful to their holy call.
 3d. Lo, the harvest season neareth, And the laborers — though few, — Shall be clothed with strength and power, God's great work to carry through.

1st. Many souls, in darkness groping, Soon shall hear the blessed sound Of salvation, sweetly rolling Through the heavens all around.
 2d. For as saviours on Mount Zion, With their banners wide unfurled Ye must waft the glorious ensign To a sorrow-stricken world.
 3d. Therefore, let thy faith be steadfast, Let thy light so shine abroad, That its rays may guide the erring To the City of our God.

THIS IS NOT ALL.

E. T. LEGGETT.

If for this only man were born—
 To eat, to sleep, to dream and die;
 With smiles to greet each radiant morn,
 And frowns to face a lowering sky;
 To win more store of glittering gold
 Than he can use, or others spare,
 Or fame to grace, when life is told,
 The triumph of some thankless heir;

To build, for pleasures by and by,
 A palace, in dreamland afar,
 Where clouds ne'er dim the azure sky,
 Nor darken hope's bright-beaming star;
 Where dreams ecstatic charm the night,
 And glowing schemes inspire the day,
 And darkness only pales to light,
 To show both dreams and life betray;

To love where love makes no return;
 To hope and no fruition there;
 All life's rewards at death to spurn;
 This all, and who'd life's trials dare?
 This is not all; beyond the spheres
 Where darkness circumscribes the view,
 And smiles are only bright with tears,
 Far brighter worlds life's dreams renew:

Beyond earth's bleak, storm-battered shore,
 Where wrecks of life and hope decay,
 Suns rise that set not evermore,
 And stars whose beams fade not away;
 There is the saint's immortal home,
 Where more than faith dare hope is given;
 There earth's tired sons and daughters come,
 For peace and rest, and find it Heaven.

THOUSANDS have admired the sheep-skin mats, so common among The Shakers. They are easily made, none who can purchase a sheep-skin needs be without one of the mats. Wash the entire skin in soap suds until thoroughly clean and white. Dry the same slowly. Pulverize equal parts of alum and salt, and dissolve in warm water. Next saturate fine sawdust with the liquid, spreading the same on the flesh side, to remain there until dry. Remove the sawdust, and as the flesh side dries rub it until soft.

THE Shakers have proved that the "bobs" or fruit of the common sumach compose the best dye for black, elegant and durable. The "bobs" are brought to a shimmering heat for a day or two, in an iron kettle, when the dye is fit for use; the iron of the kettle being sufficient to set the color—a rich black.

JOY OF INCOMPLETENESS.

—o—

If all our life was one broad glare
 Of sunlight, clear, unclouded;
 If all our path was smooth and fair,
 By no soft gloom enshrouded;
 If all life's flowers were fully blown
 Without the sweet unfolding,
 And happiness were rudely thrown
 On hands too weak for holding—
 Should we not miss the twilight hours,
 The gentle haze and sadness?
 Should we not long for storms and showers
 To break the constant sadness?

If none were sick and none were sad,
 What service could we render?
 I think if we were always glad
 We scarcely could be tender;
 Did our beloved never need
 Our patient ministrations,
 Earth would grow cold, and miss, indeed,
 Its sweetest consolation.
 If sorrow never claimed our heart,
 And every wish was granted,
 Patience would die and hope depart—
 Life would be disenchanted.

And yet in heaven there is no night,
 In heaven is no more sorrow!
 Such unimagined new delight
 Fresh grace from pain will borrow—
 As the poor seed that underground
 Seeks its true light above it;
 Not knowing what will there be found
 When sunbeams kiss and love it.
 So we in darkness upward grow,
 And look and long for heaven,
 But cannot picture it below
 Till more of life be given.

Editor of the SHAKER: Please accept our thanks for the publication of article on "Social Impurity," in the September number; also for editorials, "By Whose Authority," "Tenor of the Churches, etc." Such radical truths are doing good, and are exerting a powerful influence in the world. Go on, my brother.

A LATE writer in the Country Gentleman is enthusiastic over beets for milch cows. Having beets and carrots to feed, his experience caused him to abandon the carrots, they tending to fatten, while the beets produced a most satisfactory lactical flux.

VEGETABLES should never be cooked in iron pots unless the latter are enameled or otherwise coated internally.

WE should be exceedingly slow to conceive of God as having a body; we should beware of any imagination that anchors Him down to a spot, or that makes Him a kind of colossal man. In the earlier stages of our Christian experience it may help us to conceive of God as on a throne, like a king, and having a human figure; but the prayer and wish of a Christian, and the tendency of Christian growth, should be toward deliverance from such childish conceptions of Deity, and to have an idea like to Stephen's, that God is not body but Spirit, that heaven is not a big house or palace with a monstrous throne and an outlying city of splendor round about it, but that God is the universal and all-pervading fashion, and habit, and energy of it.
 —W. H. H. Murray.

To Bible readers, the following items may possess some interest: A day's journey was 33 and 1-5 miles. A Sabbath day's journey was about an English mile. A cubit is 22 inches, nearly. A hand's-breadth is equal to 3 1/4 inches. A finger's-breadth is equal to 1 inch. A shekel of silver was about 50 cents. A shekel of gold was $8.09. A talent of silver was $538.32. A talent of gold was $13,800. A piece of silver, or a penny, was 13 cents. A farthing was 3 cents. A mite was less than a quarter of a cent. A gera was 1 cent. An epha, or path, contains 7 gallons and 5 pints. A bin was 1 gallon and 2 pints. A firkin was 7 pints. An omer was 6 pints. A bath was 3 pints.

A GOOD and simple furniture polish consists of a little Castile soap scraped into a pint of warm water. Add three tablespoonsful of sweet oil, heat, and apply while hot.

PROPHETIC ORDER versus ORGANIZATION.

Progress implies imperfection, or unattained perfection, in an individual, or in a body. Prophecy is based upon the idea of progress. Now, as the last and greatest of Jewish Prophets was Jesus; and even his "testimony" is affirmed to be "the spirit of prophecy" itself; the conclusion is logical, that the organizations resulting from his teachings and precepts, were not a finality, but that prophecy and progress were still the law, not less than the hope of humanity; consequently the disintegration of Christian organizations has been as uniform as their formation down through the ages, and is still more potent and actively operative to-day, than at any previous period of mundane history.

The first spiritual conference organized in New York, by Partridge, Brittan, Benning, Gray, Halleck, and others, was itself a protest against all organizations, not even a chairman being in order. Babel buildings are falling before the angel of Spiritualism; the Prophet—SHAKER CHURCH—alone remains in the land, to witness the dissolution of all things—the overthrow of kingdoms, nations, peoples, tongues, and Churches—upheaval, "turning things upside down."

THE PROPHET.

Who is the Prophet? and whence does he derive his almighty power and authority, that he alone remains, amid "the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds?" The Prophet, before whom kings tremble, and become as suppliants. "Pray for me, that the things which thou hast spoken come not upon me," is the voice of the despotic tyrant no less than of the necromancer. Samuel the Prophet made and unmade kings in Israel.

When Benhadad, king of Syria, was sick, "he sent Hazael to Elijah, a Prophet in Israel, to inquire of the Lord, taking with him forty camels' burthen of every good thing in Damascus," as a present, and received for answer, "Thou mayest certainly recover, but the Lord hath shewed me, that thou shalt surely die." He then informed Hazael that he would become king of Syria, and what he would do in Israel. To Saul, Samuel said, "The Lord sent me to anoint thee king over Israel." Again: "Anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, Jehu king over Israel, and Elisha to be Prophet in thy room."

David also was thus anointed king. The Prophet Moses "poured oil on Aaron's head, and anointed him high priest." The higher law in Israel was, that no king, or high priest, was equal in power to, or safe from being supplanted in office through, the order of Prophets. Could anything be more pertinent than the inquiry, Who is the Prophet, and from what fountain does the spirit flow that the anointing oil typified? This is the more interesting from the fact, that the gift of prophecy was common to the race, and was thus unlike other powers peculiar to the Jewish organization, all of which were exclusive, and made the Jews themselves the most separated and isolated of all people, "dwelling alone, not even being numbered with the nations."

PROPHETIC GIFT UNIVERSAL.

So that a Prophet, when once his character as such was established, was no longer held as belonging to any particular people; but, as we have seen, was sought unto as a representative man, ranking above the officers of all human organizations, however divinely appointed by tutelary deities. It was this conflict of authority between the Prophets and the organizations, that caused the former to be so often stoned and killed. "Which of the Prophets have not your fathers killed, and stoned them who were sent unto them?" "It cannot be," said the iconoclastic Jesus, "that a Prophet perish out of Jerusalem:" and himself did not elsewhere die.

The high priest, king, and priesthood, were "the powers that be," who had been appointed of their God. From that standpoint, what was a Prophet, but a rebel against the existing organization, or a martyr under it? By the law of self-preservation—the first law of nature—did he not deserve to be persecuted and killed?

There were some thirty men, immediately preceding Jesus, each of whom claimed to be "some great one"—the Messiah of the Jews. These had worn out the patience of the Romans, so that Jesus was summarily dealt with. Gamaliel refers to this class as those who had made much trouble, coming to "nothing" but their own dispersion or destruction.

As the mushroom grows out of the dunghill which has hitherto produced only toadstools, so does the true Reformer and Prophet grow out of those elements which had previously produced a crop of spurious or imperfect Prophets and Reformers, for all of whose idiosyncrasies, short-comings, and crudities, he is held responsible. "Save me from my friends," is the fervent prayer of every genuine Reformer or Prophet. The half-way Christian, who cries "Lord, Lord," worshiping Jesus as one of the Three Gods who died to let him live in lust uncondemned, of all others, is the greatest sinner, and the least known of the Christ Spirit

Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation, who, by common consent, is held as the type of Jesus the Messiah, was himself a Prophet and friend of the Hebrew God. He met Melchizedek, who (under the popular ruling) was a heathen; but he was "king of righteousness," a "king of peace," a celibate; being "without father and mother, and without descent, beginning of days, or end of life, made like unto the Son of God (whoever that may be), and abideth a priest continually." In plain English, Melchizedek was a Christian, who had not only been ministered to by the Christ Spirit, from the seventh or resurrection heavens; but he had incarnated that Spirit in his character, and was a "high priest of the Most High God." Unto him, poor heathen Abraham very properly confessed his sins, which thenceforth became an established Jewish ordinance. He also paid the sacrificial tithes to Melchizedek, not only for himself, but for all the Levitical priesthood (yet in his own loins) down to Jesus, his descendant and antetype, who confessed his sins, if at all guilty, to John the Baptist, the Christ Prophet, as did Abraham to Melchizedek; for John was the antetype of Melchizedek, as was Jesus of Abraham.

PHYSICAL WAR CONDEMNED.

Abraham had just returned from the "slaughter of the kings," when Melchizedek, "the king of peace," taught him that physical war was animal—brutal; and wrong for him, and all that should proceed from him.

It took two thousand years for Abraham to reach that gift of peace in the person of his descendant, Jesus, who, under the law of Prophecy and Progress, became the "Prince of Peace," and was anointed king of righteousness; for "he loved righteousness, and hated iniquity;" and the Christ Spirit also "anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows."

CELIBACY.

It is said of Jesus (prophetically), "His life was cut off from the earth, and who shall declare his generation?" he having no physical (or natural) posterity, like Abraham; but, like Melchizedek, he too became a celibate, forsaking his earthly generative relation of father and mother, of brother and sister, for those who knew and did the will of God, this being eternal life, and not confined to earth, made him without descent, beginning of days, or end of life; thus receiving the kingdom of heaven as a little child, precisely as the Shakers of our day commence their spiritual travel.
